Walker

"By 1993 the facility must be in operation," Walker said.

The federally set deadlines must be met whether Kansas decides to remain in the compact or withdraw, Walker said.

Another aspect hinging on the decision of compact cooperation is the eventual licensing of the facility. If Kansas decides to remain in the compact, KDHE will look to the compact for guidelines on licensing its operation.

If Kansas decides to discontinue its agreement with the compact and build its own facility, it will look to the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for guidance on operations licenses.

Licensing waste disposal sites is not an out of the ordinary task for KDHE, although the new facility may add new factors for consideration if it were slated for above-ground construction.

KDHE licenses all waste dumps in Kansas, Walker said, and is responsible for enforcement of all levels of regulations for the sites.

"They have to have a license through KDHE. The license means they have to tell us what they're doing, where they're doing it, how they're doing it. They must meet certain standards of safety.

"There is a combination of state laws and rules that order us to do things. There are federal laws and rules established by Congress and passed down to us to do," Walker said. "Then the next layer is, we often have to pass down to the counties and the cities some of these things."

Low level radioactive waste characteristically consists of protective clothing worn in highly radioactive environments, chemicals used in hospital tests and university laboratory experiments, and some industrial wastes, Walker said.

"These are all considered to be low-level problems," he said. "They are not minor because some of that stuff still takes 300 years to lose its radioactivity. That's why we have to put it away for 300 years. The question is where.

"The concern is, although it might not hurt you today...the question is if it got into your drinking water or food, even a low level over a period of 15 or 20 years may hurt you," Walker said.

Walker said technology is now well developed for detecting any potential health problems such as materials found in drinking water in as small a dose as fractions of parts per billion.

Walker said he favors an above-ground facility if Kansas is selected as the site because of concern for groundwater protection.

"The danger with underground burial is it getting into the water. If it's underground storage you can't see it, you don't know what is going on down there. So the only way you can tell what's going on is by testing the water three miles away and if it has radioactive material in it its too late.

"If you build it above ground at least you can go in there every day and see what's going on — check the barrels and go around the building with a Geiger counter every morning," Walker said.

Despite new laws regulating waste disposal, Walker said he expects to be cleaning up old dump sites for years.

"This whole environment concern is a relatively new thing in our society," Walker said. "I don't think the interest in the environment is older than 15 years. Twenty years ago nobody used the word environment — nobody was concerned about the environment. That's part of the problem. Some of these environmental problems go back 75 to 100 years."

Professor's work aids diseased birds

By KARI COMPTON
Collegian Reporter

Dr. Terry Campbell said his research in bird diseases and ailments is his way of saying thanks.

"I guess this is my way of thanking the little critters for providing me with so much enjoyment," said Campbell, associate professor of surgery and medicine in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

He said his four years of research in Avian diagnostic abilities will make bird diseases easier to detect.

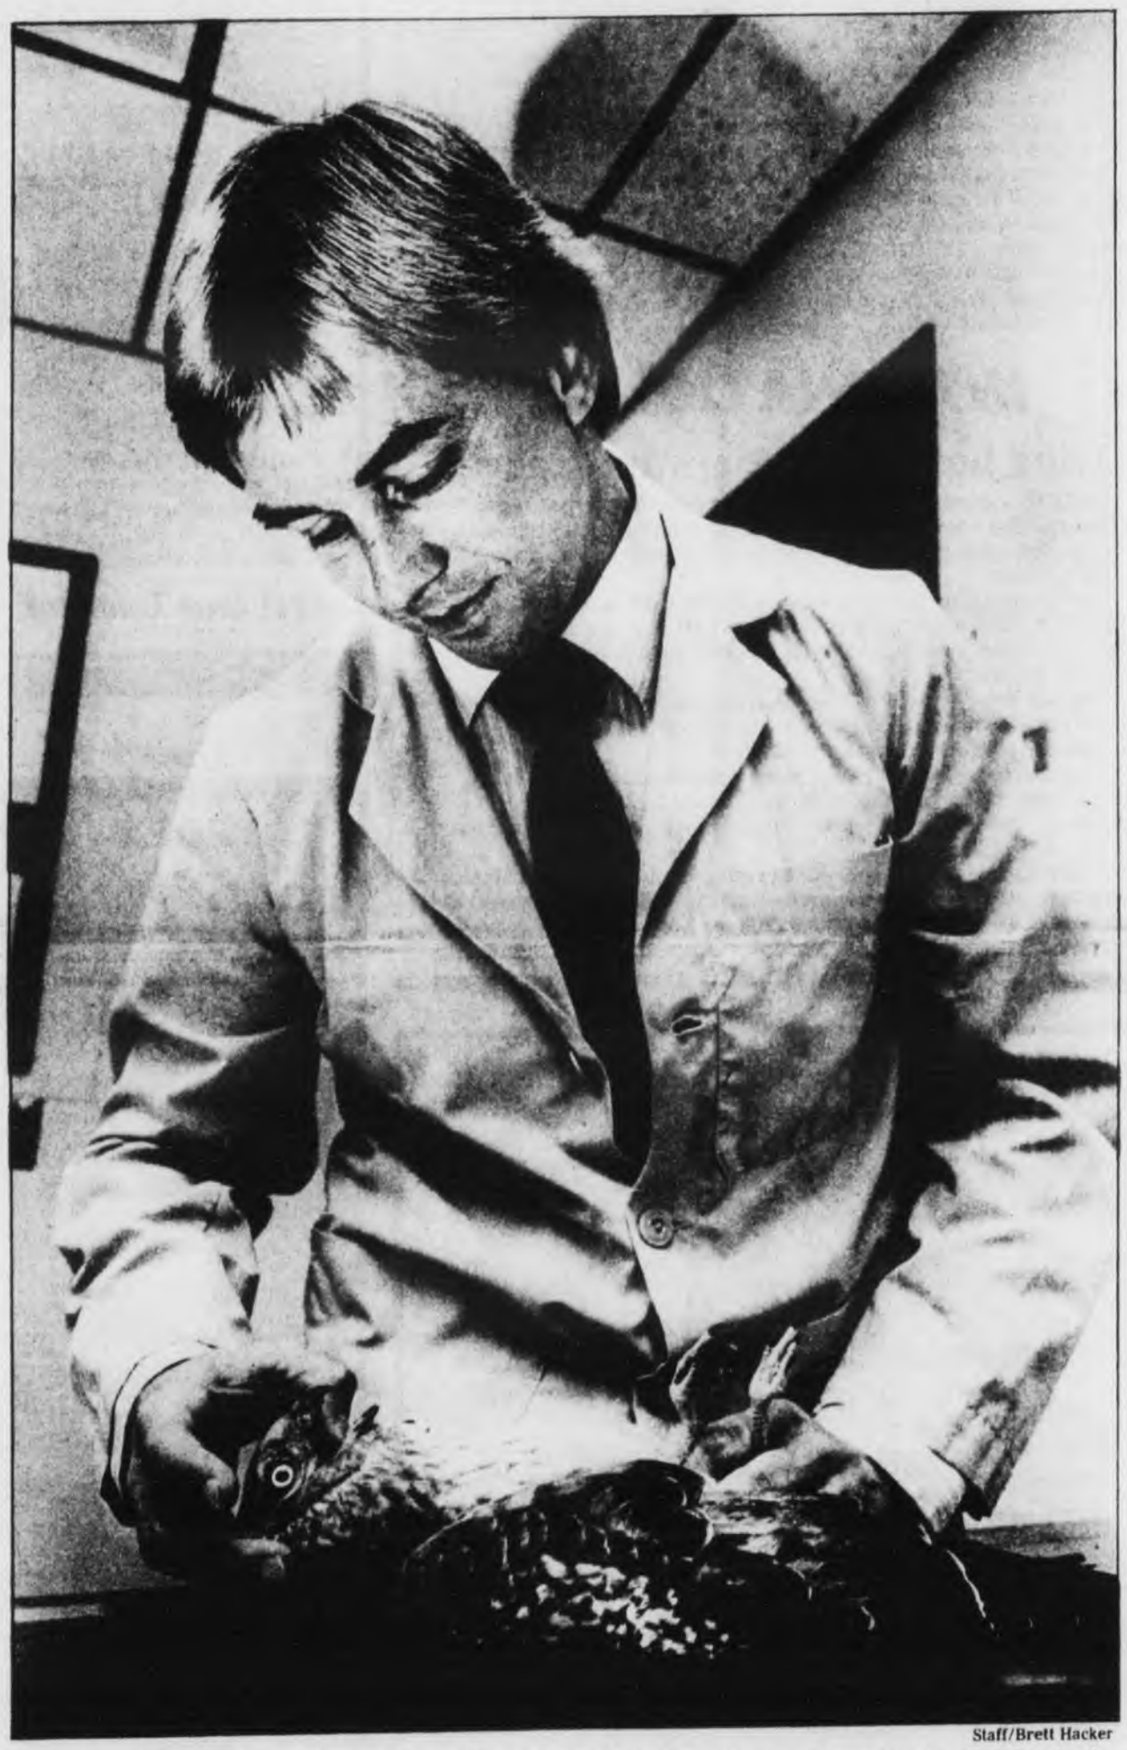
Journals contained little information on bird treatments until the Association of Avian Veterinarians was formed in 1980, Campbell said. Veterinarians had to use empirical judgments, trying one solution after another until they either found out what was wrong or the bird died, he said.

"Birds are very good at hiding their illnesses," Campbell said. "Often, the only way of determining what is wrong with them is by blood tests."

Campbell's research in clinical pathology includes three areas of study. Hemotology, the study of birds' blood cells, is used to determine the nature of a bird's disease.

Cytology is a diagnostic method used to study the cellular contents of a lesion. In clinical chemistry, doctors centrifuge a sample of the bird's blood to discover the chemicals and enzymes present.

"The application of these techniques has shown to be very useful in diagnostic methods," Campbell said.



Campbell has written a book, "Avian Hemotology and Cytology," in which he discusses the use of this research as a guide for diagnosis and treatment of bird ailments.

His research is involved with the Raptor Rehabilitation Project, aimed at rehabilitating injured raptors, or birds of prey, and returning them to nature. The program was established in 1975 by Dr. Marvin Ohlmstad, a resident in surgery at the Veterinary Medicine Center. Institutions need a state and federal permit to establish a Raptor Rehabilitation Project.

After Ohlmstad's departure, students continued the project with the college's support. Campbell has been the coordinator of the program since 1982.

Campbell said birds brought to the University through the program often have fractures and need surgery, thus providing a good teaching tool for students in veterinary medicine. The most common type of bird brought to the facility is the red-tail grouse, a native to Kansas.

Campbell said a wide variety of exotic birds have been treated at the clinic, including cockatoos, tucans, parrots, finches and emus.

Staff/Brett Hacker

Terry Campbell, assistant professor of surgery and medicine, inspects a northern harrier Tuesday in the Veterinary Medicine Complex. The bird, which has a dislocated elbow, has been at the small animal center for five days and will eventually be sent to an educational facility or a zoo.

When a bird is brought in, a team consisting of senior veterinary medicine students and a doctor diagnoses the bird and decides what treatment it needs. Wildlife health-care teams of four to six student volunteers are then responsible for feeding, administering medicine and providing daily care to the birds.

Cris Meeks, sophomore in veterinary medicine and a member of the wildlife health-care team, said one benefit of being a team member is learning how to handle animals that don't want to be handled.

"(Handling wild animals) can be dangerous, and we learn how to protect the birds and ourselves," she said.

Meeks said the experience is necessary because it cannot be learned by reading a book.

It is important to treat the raptors quickly and return them to their natural environment, Campbell said, because the birds are at

Photos record, professor says

By LAUREN BRUNO
Collegian Reporter

While state and county statutes require certain government documents be saved, the University does not fall under these rules, it was recently decided by a University attorney.

Recent concern by a K-State professor raised the question of whether K-State Police should be authorized to maintain records with potential for historic importance.

Robin Higham, professor of history, said surveillance photos taken by University police at a Jan. 28 student demonstration should not have been allowed to be destroyed.

Members of Students in Solidarity with Central America involved in the protest requested the photos be destroyed.

"The destruction of such records would be in violation of three Kansas statutes since we do not have an on-campus documents disposal schedule," said Higham.

An on-campus documents disposal schedule would determine which records should be maintained and which should be destroyed.

However, the three Kansas statutes Higham claimed prevented the KSUPD from destroying picture files are not in operation at the University level, said Dorothy Thompson, associate University attorney.

The University attorney's office investigated the Kansas statutes and found K-State innocent of any violations because the statutes.

The three statutes Higham referred to are:

—All government records deposited in the state archives are public property and shall not be disposed of except as provided by law or as authorized in the retention and disposition schedule.

—No records of state agencies or counties shall be disposed of before the retention periods designated in the schedules have elapsed without the approval of the state records board.

A retention and disposition schedule as defined by the Government Records Preservation Act of 1984 specifies which series of records have enduring value and indicates how long certain series of records should be retained before their disposal.

—Law enforcement agencies shall keep a permanent record of all felony offenses and all misdemeanors or all other offenses which involve the violation of a uniform controlled substances act.

If this act were modified to apply to the university level University police would be required to keep any documents when any criminal offenses occur.

Although the three statutes do apply at the state and county levels, Higham said he believes it necessary

University athletes enroll before others

By TOM MORRIS
Sports Editor

To solve problems K-State's student-athletes face during pre-enrollment, approximately 300 athletes are selecting classes before the first day of pre-enrollment for all students.

Reasons for the change cited by University officials include practice and competition schedules, scholarship requirements, satisfactory progress expectations, extended travel schedules and requirements not to schedule classes after 2:30 p.m.

In a related matter, first-time student athletes (freshmen and transfer students) will also be "unofficially admitted" to the University while awaiting processing of their application.

Pat Bosco, assistant vice president and director of enrollment management, said in a letter signed March 10 to Larry Travis, director of the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, the move to "unofficially admit" newcomers can in no way be misconstrued as formal acceptance.

"We are merely earmarking their courses while their out-of-state high school or community college sends us their transcripts. This procedure will allow the student the opportunity to have a better selection of classes and hopefully will ensure their academic performance in the classroom," the letter said.

Academic counselors for the athletic department have begun coordinating sessions with student advisers. The athletes' class requirements will be entered into the computers the first day of enrollment, April 13, Registrar Don Foster said.

Travis said there is a real need for the new procedure.

"When you look at it, our kids practice year-round," Travis said. "With Proposition 48, (high school students enrolling in college) have to make certain requirements, and also to remain eligible you have to be enrolled in so many hours and be enrolled in courses that are moving toward a degree."

Foster said there are three reasons University officials allowed the Senate approves committee to examine student concerns

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate approved Thursday night the establishment of an ad hoc committee to examine the current representation of the student body.

The bill states the committee is needed to address concerns about representation in Senate raised by the student body during the 1986-87 Senate term.

"Many students were concerned enough to sign the original petition that was unsuccessful in placing this issue on the ballot," said Pat Muir, junior in agricultural economics and one of the bill's sponsors.

"We owe it to these people to unbiasly analyze the issue effectively," he said.

However, Justin Sanders, graduate student in physics, said he did not see the need for the committee.

"Current representation is quite adequate. I believe living groups have outnumbered residence halls in Senate, however, I feel the problem lies in the residence halls not actively participating in the political process," Sanders said.

Doug Oetinger, junior in business administration, said one purpose of the committee will be to find the reason for lack of involvement of not only residence hall members, but other groups not participating in the student political system.

In other action, Senate approved revisions of the Lafene Student Health Advisory Committee bylaws, rules and regulations.

Of those revisions, one was an increase of faculty members on the committee from one to two.

In addition, senators also heard first reading of a bill that, if passed next week, will establish a Student Governing Association Constitutional and Bylaws Revision Commission.

Sanders, sponsor of the bill, said the commission is needed because it will take a concentrated effort to examine the SGA constitution and bylaws. That is too much work for Senate Operations Committee, he said.

The committee reviews all pending legislation.

Bill may spark compact pullout

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate committee got its first look Thursday at a bill its chairman said could lead to the state's withdrawal from a regional compact for the disposal of low-level nuclear waste.

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee reviewed a measure that would establish a state agency to oversee the disposal of low-level radioactive waste in Kansas.

The Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee later voted to introduce the bill at the request of the energy committee's members. Federal and State Affairs is exempt from a deadline that prevents most committees from introducing bills this late in the session.

The energy committee's chairman, Sen. Merrill Werts, R-Junction City, said he plans to work the bill along with another that would take the state out of the compact. He has set aside four days next week for hearings and possible committee discussion on the two measures.

"I think it's implicit that if this law be enacted, we would at the same time withdraw from the compact," Werts said.

The most vocal opponent of the compact on the committee, Sen. Paul Feleciano, D-Wichita, said the committee's vote signalled that legislators are seriously considering pulling out of the compact, something he said probably was not true several weeks ago.

Questions about whether Kansas should stay in the compact with Arkansas, Louisiana, Nebraska and Oklahoma have arisen because the state has about a 75 percent chance of becoming the host state for a regional waste disposal site.

Supporters of the compact say it is the most efficient way for a state to dispose of its waste. They also cite a recent opinion from Attorney General Robert T. Stephan that said any state might be able to dump its waste in Kansas if it establishes its own repository.

Lawmakers think they have to make a decision this session because Congress has set a 1988 deadline for compacts to designate a host state, and a disposal facility must be operating by 1993.

Alleged spy faces more charges

WASHINGTON — The Marine Corps has brought additional charges against Sgt. Clayton J. Lonetree, the first of two Marine security guards arrested on suspicion of spying while working at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow, Pentagon sources said Thursday.

The sources, who agreed to discuss the matter only if not identified, said the decision to add five additional charges to the 19 counts already pending had been prompted by the recent arrest of another guard, Cpl. Arnold Bracy.

The sources declined to discuss the specific allegations underlying the new charges. But they said the charges included another count of espionage; two counts of conspiracy to commit espionage, and two counts of "espionage-related" general misconduct charges.

The new count of espionage brings to two the number of such charges pending against the 25-year-old Lonetree. Under the Uniform Code of Military Justice, a conviction on an espionage count carries a maximum penalty of death.

The sources said the new charges were "directly related to the surfacing of Bracy," a 21-year-old corporal who worked with Lonetree in Moscow for roughly eight months in 1985 and 1986.

According to the sources, military and State Department investigators now suspect that Bracy and Lonetree, working together, may have provided Soviet agents access to the Moscow embassy during after-work hours. It appears there were times when the two men were paired as the only guards at the embassy, one source explained

Lightning suspect in rocket failure

CAPE CANAVERAL, Fla. — An unmanned rocket that appeared to have been hit by lightning careened out of control Thursday and was destroyed by radio signal 51 seconds after it lifted off with an $83 million military communications satellite.

A NASA videotape clearly showed a lightning bolt descending from the vicinity of the Atlas-Centraur rocket, hidden in clouds, and striking the launch pad about the time the vehicle exploded. Launch officials, however, said they did not want to speculate on what went wrong until they analyzed data.

Flaming debris from the shattered rocket and payload plunged into the Atlantic Ocean about three miles offshore. Coast Guard boats hurried to the scene to pick up any floating debris.

The 137-foot rocket lifted off in a rain storm at 4:22 p.m. EST and quickly darted into a cloud bank. As it disappeared, observers saw what they thought was a lightning flash near the vehicle.

NASA launch commentator George Diller said the rocket appeared to be flying normally, but then he suddenly announced, "We have lost all telemetry data...We appeared to have lost the vehicle."

Later, he reported that the rocket had shot out of control and was blown apart, at an altitude of 14,250 feet, by a radio signal that denotated explosive charges in the vehicle.

Car kills 3 students in walk-a-thon

OXFORD, Miss. — A truck slammed into a car trailing a group of University of Mississippi sorority sisters taking part in a charity walk-a-thon Thursday, killing three students and injuring 13, authorities said.

A 1-ton truck hauling a hay baler crashed into the car behind the walkers, pushing it into the crowd, said university spokesman Ed Meek.

"The (car) flipped and went on top of the walkers," he said, adding that two students were dead at the scene. A third student died Thursday night at Regional Medical Center in Memphis, Tenn.

Committee endorses Amtrak study

TOPEKA — The House Transportation Committee endorsed Thursday a Senate-passed bill that authorizes a feasibility study to determine what it would cost for the state to subsidize Amtrak rail passenger service across Kansas on a Kansas City-to-Denver route.

The vote was 11-6 recommending the bill for passage by the full House, after a motion to table the measure had failed.

The bill, whose main sponsor is Sen. Roy Ehrlich, R-Hoisington, would require the state Departments of Transportation and Commerce to study the practicality of the state making up losses which would be incurred if passenger trains were restored on the Union Pacific Railroad tracks between the two cities.

Ehrlich has said Colorado officials are interested in the project, too, but Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, chairman of the Senate Transportation Committee, has reported the Colorado Legislature rejected a bill similar to the Kansas measure this year.

Transportation officials have estimated the cost of the study at upwards of $50,000. It would include inspection of the tracks by Amtrak officials, plus ridership projections and an estimate of the over-all financial prospects for such a route.

Aids teen-ager returns to school

SMITH CENTER — A teen-ager who was infected by the AIDS virus during a blood transfusion was welcomed back to Smith Center High School Wednesday, two days after the school board changed its decision to bar him from a work-study program in an elementary school.

Cameron Beach, a 17-year-old junior, spent about an hour and a half at the high school Wednesday chatting with classmates, said his father, Curtis Beach.

"He really didn't attend school as much as visit it," the elder Beach said. "He was pleased to see all of his classmates again."

The board's decision March 9 to bar Curtis from the grade school program was not the reason he has stayed out of high school, his father said. The board's 5-1 decision Monday night to rescind the previous vote "made us feel a little bit better so we decided to go back," Curtis said.

Dying hostage petitions for trade

BEIRUT, Lebanon — American hostage Jesse Turner said on a videotape Thursday that fellow American captive Alann Steen is dying, and he urged the United States and Israel to accept the terms for Steen's release.

Their kidnappers, who said Monday that Steen was near death, want to trade him for 100 Arab prisoners held in Israel and demand that the United States persuade the Israelis. Both governments have refused the deal.

"You all know that our fellow Alann Steen is dying," Turner said in a five-minute videotape delivered to the offices of the leftist daily newspaper As-Safir in Moslem west Beirut.

"The doctor says in his report that: 'After checking the patient Alann Steen I found out that he had a crisis in his blood pressure...The symptoms he had were headache, hemiparicia, anxiety and difficulty in breathing.'"

It was not clear what he meant by hemiparicia. A similar-sounding condition, hemiparesis, is defined in Dorland's Illustrated Medical Dictionary as "muscular weakness affecting one side of the body."

There was no indication whether this was the illness in question.

Taxi driver moved from local hospital

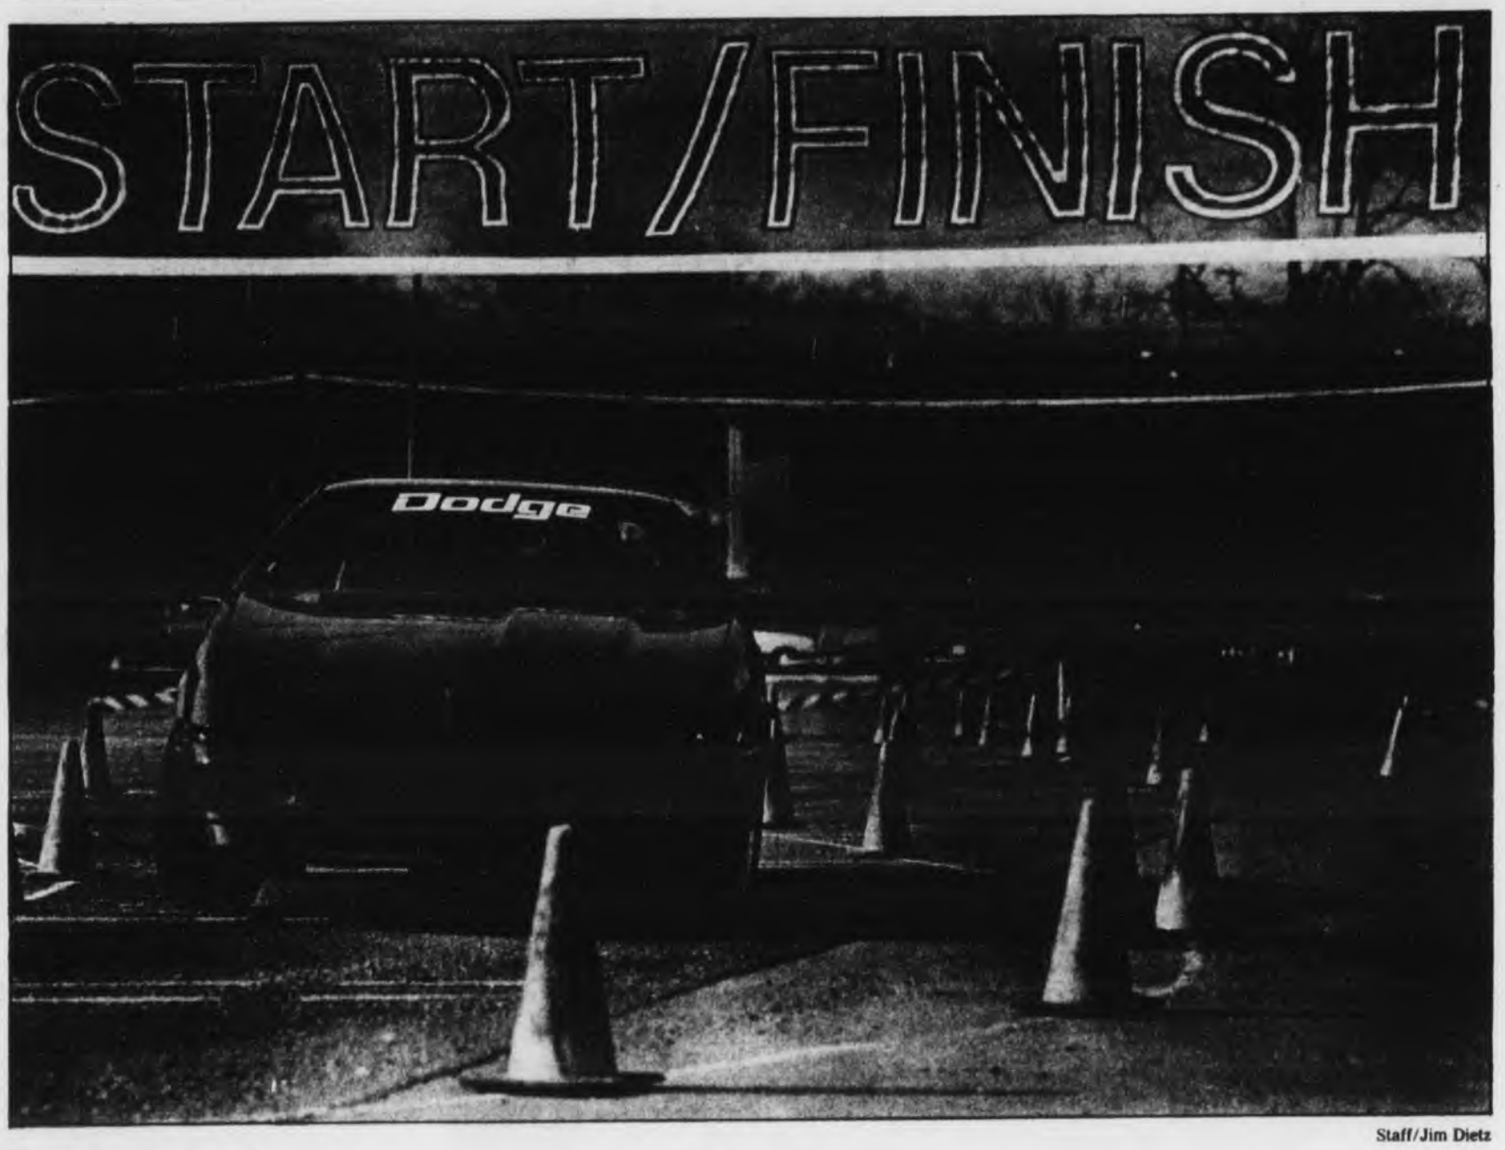
By The Collegian Staff

A Manhattan taxi driver, who has remained in critical condition since a Jan. 4 stabbing, was moved from Irwin Army Hospital in Fort Riley to KU Medical Center in Lawrence.

Chuck Primm, 42, who was stabbed repeatedly while driving two men from Aggieville to the Plaza Speedway east of Fort Riley's Marshall Field, was moved to the facilities in Lawrence Wednesday. Still in critical condition and on a respirator due to lung damage, Primm is now reported to be "communicative."

Rosezella Potter, Primm's sister and a K-State custodial worker, said her brother is able to mouth words and communicate somewhat, but is still in about the same condition as before.

"To us he is doing better. It may not seem that way to others who see him, but we think he's better," Potter said. "I plan on visiting him this weekend.



"The staff at Irwin Army Hospital did an excellent job in caring for him, but now he is at better facilities," she said.

A preliminary hearing is scheduled today in Geary County District Court for one of two 18-year-old Junction City men arrested in connection with the stabbing of Primm.

Jerry Thomas O'Dell, 18, and Stephen Stratton, 18, were both charged last week with aggravated kidnapping, aggravated robbery, conspiracy to commit murder in the first degree or aggravated robbery and attempted first degree murder in connection with the Jan. 4 stabbing of Primm.

A preliminary hearing for O'Dell, who turned 18 Wednesday, had been scheduled in Geary County District Court on his birthday, but was postponed so that it could be determined whether he should be tried as an adult or a juvenile, said Geary County attorney Steve Opat, who filed the charges against the two men.

O'Dell's hearing has now been set for April 10. Opat said he has filed a motion to certify the juvenile to stand trial as an adult in Geary County District Court.

Stephan to hold forum on human rights, trips

By The Collegian Staff

Kansas Attorney General Robert T. Stephan will hold a forum at 10 a.m. Saturday in the Union Catskellar during the All-University Open House.

Stephan's speech, "Human Rights from Forsyth County, Georgia, to the Soviet Union," is being sponsored by the Department of Political Science.

Stephan will recount his experiences while participating in the march through "all-white" Forsyth County.

Orma Linford, associate professor of political science, said the department tries to have a prominent political figure speak at Open House every year. Last year, the department sponsored a forum featuring the Kansas gubernatorial candidates, Linford said, and the forum won an outstanding program award for the department.

In addition to Stephan's forum, Linford said a panel discussion, "Irangate: Riddle in a Mystery?" will begin at 2 p.m. in the Union Catskellar and will offer a discussion of the U.S. arms sales to Iran and U.S. aid to Nicaraguan Contras.

Panel members will be Merlin Gustafson, associate professor of political science; Michael Suleiman, professor of political science; and Alden Williams, professor of political science.

Attribution correction

Two paragraphs in the story "Ill-Gotten Grades" in the All-University Open House insert were wrongly attributed. Stan Elsea, assistant professor of management, was the source for the following:

"A lot of instructors grade on a curve, then people who come by their grades dishonestly push that curve up and cause other people to get lower grades. At the end four years you suddenly find yourself competing with people who have better grades than you have. One of the very first things a recruiter looks at is grade point average. That's not always the best indicator in the world of what kind of person you are, however it is the one really quantitative thing a recruiter can put his hands on to give some sort of an indication of the quality of the recruit.

"So if a person has a better GPA than you have and they came by it dishonestly, that person is going to get the good job and you're going to get the next-best job."

Shop owners await damage appraisals

By CHRIS DOLL
Staff Writer

The three businesses in Aggieville hit by a fire Wednesday night are cleaning up and waiting for insurance companies to appraise the damages.

Westron Wynde Music Shop, 1200 Moro St., received the most extensive damages of the three stores. Vicki Shult, owner of Westron Wynde, said she estimated the store will be closed for three weeks.

Shult has moved the store's merchandise to a space in Laramie Plaza. She said she will also resume musical instrument lessons at the same location on a temporary basis.

Fire officials estimated damages of $25,000 to the contents of the store. However, Shult believes the actual cost will be higher.

"The water and smoke damage was pretty extensive," Shult said.

Some of the more expensive items lost were a computer, keyboards and a drum set, she said.

"We're basically getting moved out, getting estimates on repairs and finding out exactly what we lost," Shult said. "We're trying to sort it all out."

The store's electricity, which was shut off during the fire by officials, has not yet been turned on, she said.

Damages to the structure of the entire building were not yet estimated, Chartier said. At the time of the accident, fire officials estimated the damage to be $15,000.

The other two stores damaged by the fire, Benetton and Undercover, received minor smoke damage and did not have to close for repairs.

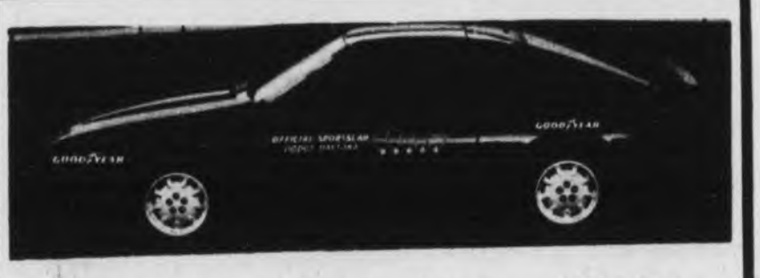
Shelley Mann, manager of Benetton, 1222 Moro St., said the store received no water damage, but because of smoke damage the carpet will need to be cleaned and deodorized. She estimated the cleaning cost at $30-$50.

Mann said she was surprised the damage done to the store was not more. None of the merchandise was harmed, and the store sustained no structural damage.

"It's kind of amazing, really," Mann said.

Pat Pierce, manager of Undercover, 1224 Moro St., said the store received no merchandise or structural damage. Like the Benetton store, the carpet will have to be cleaned, she said.

"There is a slight odor, but that's about it.



"We're pleased with how fast the fire department got here," Pierce said. "They saved us all kinds of damage expenses."

The fire was due to electrical problems in a light fixture on the southest corner of the building housing all three businesses, said to Bill Smith, Manhattan fire chief. The fire spread to the attic and exited through the roof.

Open house is chance for University to shine

K-State's University Open House this weekend gives prospective students a chance to see the many opportunities that would be open to them as students at K-State.

The weekend also gives the different colleges a chance to show off a bit and be proud of the accomplishments attributed to education. There are the usual events that draw large crowds such as the Little American Royal in Weber Arena, but other smaller events are just as interesting.

There will be an Egg Drop Structure contest to test different designs that students in the Concept of Structure class have designed to prevent an egg from breaking when dropped from a certain height.

A glass-blowing demonstration, skits in foreign languages and a presentation in sign language are part of the displays in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Everyone involved in Open House should take this opportunity to put his or her best foot forward to show prospective students what K-State has to offer and show parents what their money really pays for.

K-State should make the most of this opportunity to shine. And if, as advertisements say, the excitement is building at K-State, there is no better time to prove it.

U.S. beginning to win war on drunk driving

Tougher laws and changes in social attitudes have led to a recent decrease in the incidence of driving under the influence of alcohol across the United States. Some experts view the shift as part of a broader social trend emphasizing personal health habits, including less smoking, more physical exercise and greater attention toward nutrition.

Others see the widening of public and legislative support for tougher laws against drunk driving and tighter enforcement of existing regulations as the reasons for this decrease.

This recent decrease in the incidence of drunk driving is a positive sign for Americans in more than one way.

First, fewer people will be killed on the roadways. According to federal statistics, 44,000 people die on American highways each year, about half of them in accidents involving alcohol.

Second, this decline shows that Americans are beginning to realize the devastating effects of drunk driving and are taking actions to stop these effects.

However, just because there is a decline, this doesn't mean drinkers and friends of drinkers can let up on their attitudes toward driving drunk.

Attempts to help party may detour speed bill

When the public elects its lawmakers, it is expected that these officials will voice their constituents' concerns and represent their needs and wishes. Yet those we have elected have not heard — or are ignoring — us.

The issue is increasing the speed limit to 65 mph on rural interstate highways — passed by both the House and Senate — which has been packaged into the $88 billion highway bill President Reagan is eager to veto.

Calling it a "lemon" and "pork barrel waste," Reagan said he wanted to block the five-year plan before it gets to his desk. And he has enlisted Kansas Sen. Bob Dole to aid him in fighting the plan. So while Dole supports the speed limit increase, he nonetheless went along with Reagan and voted against the highway measure.

In addition to the speed limit change, the highway bill contains $28 billion for projects in Kansas.

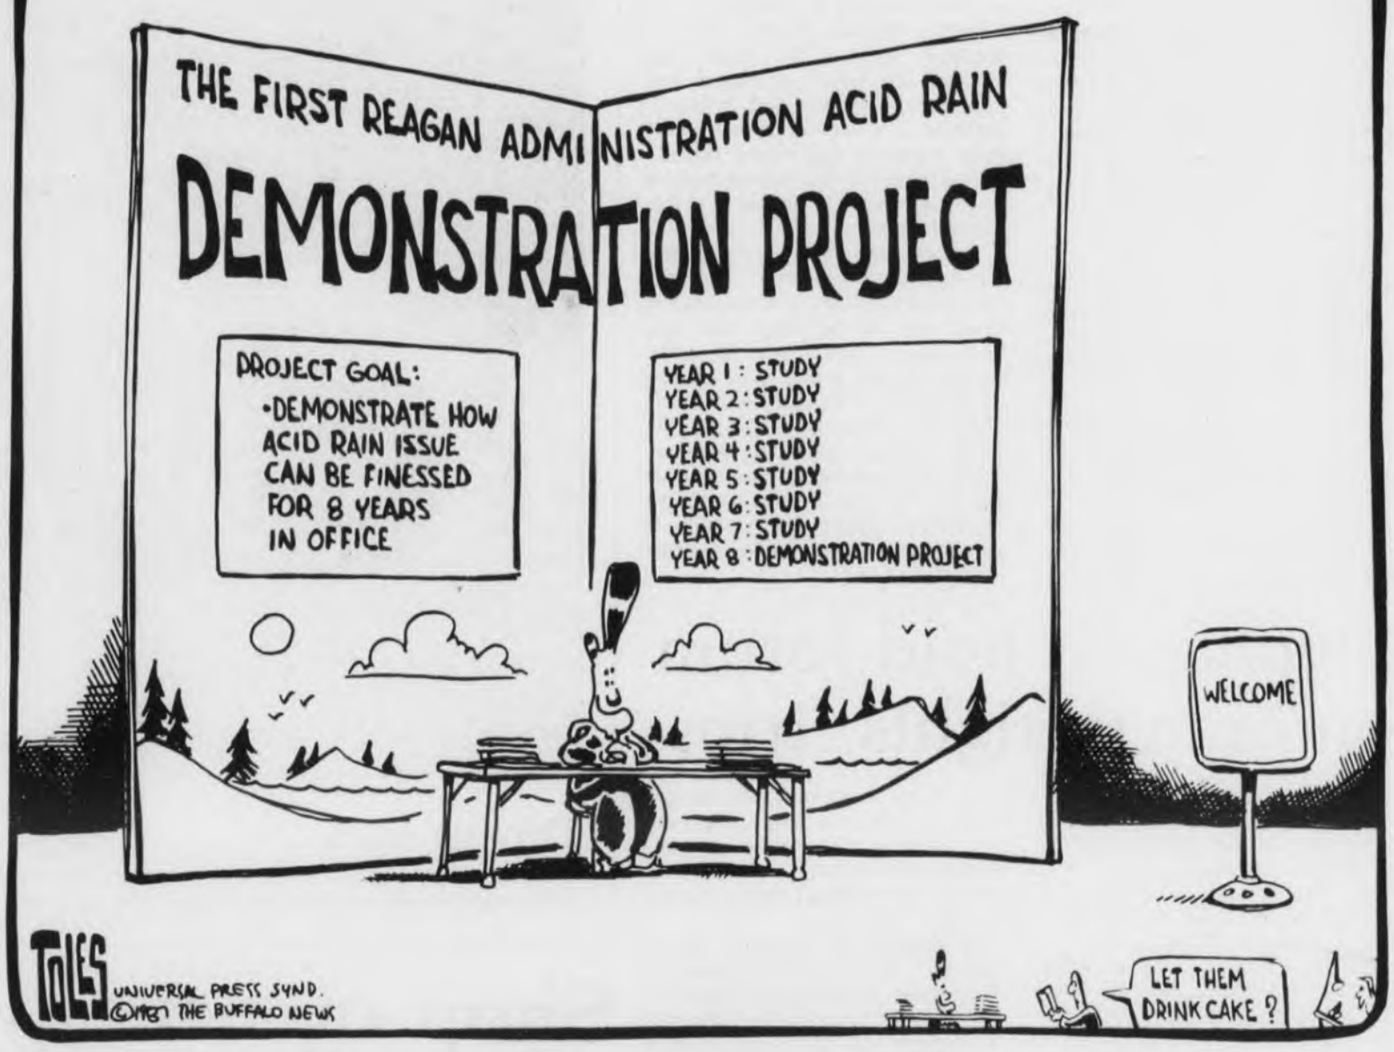
Other members of the Kansas delegation voted for the bill and plan to vote for an override of Reagan's veto. Kansas officials have said the state needs federal money for highway construction.

Constituents have flooded officials with letters to support it. And construction workers are petitioning for it.

Without quick passage, Kansas projects will be pushed back because the state won't be able to take advantage of the spring and summer peak season for construction. A veto will throw the economy into recession, and Congress can't write a new bill before construction season starts. The economic impact of the loss of highway construction funds for a year if it does not pass will be tremendous.

But, for Reagan, this is unimportant. What matters to him is to show he is still in command and remains a powerful and active leader as the Iran-Contra affair continues to unfold. He believes his veto will restore his waning political strength in the eyes of the public.

Reagan should not use the highway bill to try and vindicate his tainted image from the Iran-Contra arms scandal. These reasons for opposing the measure are weak and petty at best.



Voters want the increased speed limit, and the additional funding from the highway bill will benefit Kansans. Dole should listen and heed those who supported him, not give in to party politics in an attempt to rebuild a tarnished administration.

The final stretch

Last months anything but easy

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

I don't know about the rest of you but I've about had it. I'm at a definite stressed-out point and I'm about ready to yell out the window, "I'm mad as hell and I'm not going to take it anymore!"

Why does the world insist on causing me more problems? It's my last semester, folks, and I should be able to take it easy, get the old resume ready and start pounding the pavement for a job. Right? Wrong.

For some reason this semester has been the pits. It's had its good points but for the most part it hasn't gone the way it was supposed to at all. I told several people at the end of last semester that if I didn't have just one semester to go I would drop out of school. Well, translate that now to "just two months left."

So what makes me stay with it? What is so important about staying with this in spite of the pain and hassles?

I suppose it's because I can see the light at the end of the tunnel. I suppose it's the sense of self-determination, the idea of sticking to something I chose to start until I finish it.

I suppose it's plain old stubbornness and tenacity.

The human psyche is a little too deep for me. I have no idea what prompts one person to be a fighter when the odds are not in favor of winning and what prompts another person to be the exact opposite. I have no idea why some people persist and others just let the world wear them down.

The only person I really know anything about is me. All I know is what I do to keep going, to see the possibilities and alternatives, to survive.

I really don't consider myself all that stubborn or tenacious. But I am steady and I do know my own limitations.

You know the old saying, "Slow and easy wins the race." That's me. I take it one step at a time. One semester, one month, one week, one day, one hour, one minute at a time.

If the world gets too dark and seems to be too much to handle, I narrow down my portion of the world. This week it's narrowed down to Kedzie or McCain, to one room, to one desk and chair — my desk and chair. Other times my world is narrowed down to my apartment with the four walls solidly closed against the outside world.

If I procrastinate or if the work load just gets to be too much, it's narrowed down to what's due first. I set priorities — one thing after the next in a somewhat logical fashion until I'm finished.

This week everything narrowed down to the assignments for each day, just in time for the assignment to be turned in.

I try not to worry about the things I can't control. I can only control my own behavior — and that seems beyond my capabilites on occasion. What other people do or think is out of my hands. If they choose to be angry or sad, then that's their world, not mine. If I choose to be angry or sad, then that's my world and no one else needs to worry about it.

A lot of times that doesn't work though. My friends are important to me so when one of them is depressed, I try to be there if they need or want someone to talk to. I hope they all realize that. Likewise, I've been known to call on friends for the support I know I can't give myself.

One of the sayings I keep repeating to myself has to do with control. Written by Reinhold Niebuhr, the verse helps me remember I do not need to be in control all the time and it is very possible I can't be in control all the time.

God grant me the serenity to accept the things I cannot change, the courage to change the things I can, and the wisdom to know the difference.

I narrow down my world, I don't worry about the things I can't control, I set priorities, and I also do things for myself.

I'll do things just for me, just because I need to do something to pamper myself, to realize I am an individual who matters in this world.

I'll take a nap, go to the movies, watch TV, relax with friends, whatever feels right at the moment. Before today is over, my world will be narrowed down to one task — relaxing with friends before the rat race starts again. I made those plans for today Monday.

I set short-term goals for myself. The next date to survive to is April 3, then April 10. (I have marked on the calendar to collapse on the 10th.)

I haven't looked past the 10th yet. But I do have concert tickets for April 17 in Topeka and a graduation ceremony to attend May 16. So there are items on my calendar.

After May 16, who knows? I only know I'll have already handled the problem or I'll take care of it then. I may be handling the problem of the future differently than many people would but that's my way. I do things my own way and have learned over the years to never apologize for it.

So far the system has worked for me. Considering I'm still here and I'm still moving forward.

Letters

Crux of the issue

Editor,

Re: Mary Jo Lampe's letter "Try involvement" in Tuesday's Collegian. I was elected to two terms of Student Senate from the College of Business Administration. I, like Lampe, was a non-greek senator who got involved because the political process intrigued me.

Lampe and I have more in common than this interest. We both served as president for the same greek little sister organization. I am the first to admit that my greek affiliation helped me become a senator. Two of my "greek brothers" encouraged me to run for Senate and others, as well as independent friends, helped my campaign.

My involvement with the little sister organization increased my base of friends from that of my residence hall floormates. I write this history to explain that even though Lampe and I are not "greek," neither are we as independent as other senators such as Cath Sayler or Virgil Wiebe.

Perhaps novice senators fall into a habit of defending the institution far too quickly. In my first term of office, we debated longer about the infamous button bill (detailing the merits of senators wearing buttons on Thursdays to increase conversations with constituents) than we did about allocating tens of thousands of dollars to the Union.

I believe the Union was deserving of the funding. However, the magnitude of these two issues was not shown in the amount of debate. This is, at the very least, bizarre.

As for Steve Milligan, he does more research on the issues he discusses than most senators do in their whole term. He has every right to keep alive an issue he believes to be important. Whether a person believes non-greek people are not as involved in Senate because of apathy or because the system holds them back is the whole crux of the representation referendum and could only be answered by a poll of the students' views.

Israeli indecencies

Editor,

In a letter in the March 3 issue of the Collegian, Jacki Gordon posed the question: "Why does the United States continue to support Israel?" Gordon attempts to answer this question by making a number of unfounded, if not wholly inaccuate, claims.

One such claim is that Israel is "one of America's few (if not only) true allies in the Middle East." If so, Gordon needs to explain why Israel sent agents to Cairo in 1955 to bomb the U.S. Information Agency in an attempt to disrupt relations between Egypt and the United States. Gordon should also explain why, in 1967, Israel's military deliberately attacked and destroyed the U.S.S. Liberty, killing 34 American sailors and wounding a number of others.

Gordon could enlighten us as to why, in 1985, federal investigators concluded that Israel was responsible for the theft of large amounts of nuclear materials from a Pennsylvania warehouse. Gordon could add to that explanation as to why, in 1985, Israel refused to cooperate with the United States when TWA Flight 847 was hijacked. Are these the words and actions of a true ally?

Another claim made by Gordon is that Israel and the United States have a common interest in promoting peace. Gordon then suggests that those who criticize Israel and Israeli policies could "spend their time more wisely pointing out such heinous atrocities as terrorism and human rights indecencies that pose a real threat to our future security."

Apparently, it has not occurred to Gordon that those who criticize Israel and Israeli policies do so BECAUSE they oppose terrorism and human rights violations. Apparently, Gordon is not aware that in the 1982 invasion of Lebanon, Israel used cluster bombs (which are prohibited by international law), killing 40,000 Palestinians and leaving 100,00 more homeless.

In conclusion, I should add that I share Gordon's dream of peace. Sharing that dream, however, does not mean one should live in a dream world where aggressive Israeli policies are hailed as peaceful overtures.

Grading system proves 'more versatile'

By STEVE LAWRENCE
Collegian Reporter

Out with the old, in with the new.

A computer-scanning system that grades more than 100,000 cards a semester is being phased out, while a new test-scoring process is being implemented.

The new process includes using new test forms and replacing the optical mark reader system that reads the pencil marks on cards used for grading tests, said Neil Erdwien, system software specialist in computing activities.

Although the scanning system is being replaced, the old computer hardware system will remain, and the new test-scoring cards can be used with the new scanner.

One reason for the change is concern the OMR would fail and it would irreparable, Erdwien said.

"The new grading card system has been needed for a long time," he said.

"The reader is old and very unreliable," he said. "The new system helps read marks better."

Another problem with the OMR system is the system would sometimes miss the answer if it was marked too lightly, Erdwien said.

Although the new system will mean additional work for the computers, the professors won't have to spend as much time trying to correct errors as they did under the OMR system, he said.

While the new system may not have as many problems, it is slower. The OMR can process 300 forms a minute, yet the new system can only process 36 forms a minute.

Erdwien said the answer forms used with the new system offer more versatility in what the forms can be used for.

The new forms could easily be used as ballots in elections or for teacher evaluations, he said.

So far the new system has only been used by one professor, but Erdwien said he has encouraged other professors to try the system.

Two men charged

Police locate tortured women in cellar

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — A man accused of keeping half-naked women chained in his secret cellar of horrors for torture, rape and killing, and of stockpiling human limbs in a freezer was ordered held without bond Thursday.

Only when a woman went to police Wednesday, saying she had escaped from the rundown row house in north Philadelphia, did police begin to suspect something foul was in the cellar of Gary Heidnik, a 43-year-old licensed practical nurse.

Heidnik was arrested after police went to the house and found three young women, naked from the waist down, chained in the basement. They also found 24 pounds of human limbs in a freezer and other body parts in the kitchen, police said.

Wednesday evening, police found the body of a woman in remote woods in southern New Jersey and arrested a second suspect, Cyril Brown, a sometime occupant of the house. Heidnik and Brown each were charged with murder in the death of the woman whose nude body was found in New Jersey.

The survivors, ages 18 to 24, spoke of torture and rape, of a skeletal head in a cooking pot and a human rib cage in an oven, of two women who died in captivity, one electrocuted in a watery pit, one killed in a fall.

"He handcuffed me to a pipe and said nothing would happen to me if I cooperated," said Lisa Thomas, 19, one of the women found in Heidnik's basement.

"'Just trust me,' he said," Thomas told the Philadelphia Daily News from her hospital room. "Then he took the lid off a hole and two girls came out."

One of the three women was in stable condition Thursday at Episcopal Hospital, where she was being treated for dehydration, malnutrition and sexual abuse. Thomas, who spent the night at the hospital, and another woman had been treated and released, hospital spokesman Anthony Cirillo said.

Thomas said she had eaten nothing but dog food, dog biscuits and water since Heidnik lured her to his house three days before Christmas with a flashy car and offers of money for clothes and restaurants.

Neighbors said they had complained of foul odors and heard loud music coming from Heidnik's house. Police said they had no record of the reports but were investigating.

"It smelled terrible — like someone left a big piece of steak in the fire," said Doris Zibulka, 32, his next door neighbor.

Authorities, neighbors and acquaintances said Heidnik prowled the neighborhood for mentally impaired women, showing off fancy cars before enslaving them in his house, where a sign read: "United Church of the Ministries of God."

Annual pageant to feature 12 K-State students

By The Collegian Staff

It's time to roll out the red carpet for the 31st Annual Miss Manhattan/K-State Scholarship Pageant.

Twelve contestants, all K-State students, will be vying for the 1987 crown and scholarship money. The pageant will get under way at 8 p.m. Saturday in the Manhattan High School Auditorium.

Contestant judging will be based on talent, interviewing, poise and appearance.

The winner will earn the right to compete in the Miss Kansas Pageant in Pratt. The winner of the Miss Kansas Pageant will go on to Atlanta to compete in the Miss America Pageant.

"I believe the reason students are attracted to the pageant is because it allows them to develop themselves and become better prepared for interviewing once they are out of school," said Nancy O'Kane, director of the Miss Manhattan/K-State Pageant.

The winner will receive a $1,000 scholarship, and the first runner-up will get $400. Second, third and fourth runners-up will receive $200, $150 and $100 respectively.

"Instead of babysitting in the summer, this will allow the students to earn scholarship money to help pay for their school," O'Kane said.

The Manhattan Jaycees and the Miss Manhattan/K-State Pageant board organize and execute this official Miss America preliminary pageant.

Tickets for the pageant are $5 for adults and $3 for high school students and younger. Tickets will be available until 6 p.m. Friday.

Engineers break telefund record

Volunteer students from the College of Engineering raised $81,401 during the college's recent nationwide telefund. The total, the largest amount ever raised by the college, was obtained from 2,330 pledges.

John Dollar, assistant dean of engineering, said the final donation amount will be about 30 percent higher than the total amount pledged due to matching funds made by companies employing K-State engineers.

This year's top caller for the college was John Socolofsky, junior in mechanical engineering, who obtained 40 pledges worth $1,450.

Former professor of marketing dies

Alvin Mulanax, a member of the K-State faculty for 30 years, died Tuesday at The St. Mary Hospital in Manhattan.

Mulanax, a former professor of marketing, joined the faculty in 1947 as an instructor and taught marketing, economics, business and sales courses.

In 1951, Malanax was appointed assistant professor and was promoted to associate professor in 1966. He retired in 1977 at the age of 64.

Older student funding available

Deadlines for scholarships available to undergraduate students over 25 are drawing near.

Ruth Hoeflin, director of FENIX, a program which assists older students, said the scholarships are primarily based on financial need. Students applying for these scholarships are asked to submit a list of grades, however, to ensure the student will continue to go to school.

Vet college announces first trainee

Neal Woollen, temporary instructor in pathology, has been named the first animal genetic disease post-doctoral trainee in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

James Coffman, dean of the College of Veterinary Medicine, said the purpose of the program is to build on the work of Horst Leipold, K-State distinguished professor and world leader in genetic disease investigation of domestic animals.

The program is made possible by funding from numerous breed associations.

Researchers to speak at conference

Four cancer researchers from K-State are scheduled to speak at the Kansas Cancer Research Conference in Kansas City, Kan.

The four are Jean Pierre Perchellet, assistant professor of biology; Donald Roufa, professor of biology; Melvin Center, associate professor of biology; and Richard Consigli, distinguished professor of biology.

The conference, April 9-10 in Sudler Auditorium at the University of Kansas Medical Center, is designed to create an opportunity for cancer researchers to get together to discuss recent progress.

His true identity may be unknown to K-State fans, but everyone knows him as....

Willie

Scott Scrogin, senior in mechanical engineering, alias Willie the Wildcat, has helped raise spirit and entertained K-State fans during this year's games.

Touchdown XI or Willie the Wildcat.

Most K-State fans recognize Willie's name, despite the fact the bobcat, Touchdown XI, is the University's official mascot.

Official or not, Willie the Wildcat has brought laughter and thrills to young and old alike who follow K-State athletics.

Each year, a new Willie is selected by K-State's pep coordinating council. Scott Scrogin, senior in mechanical engineering, donned the lifelike wildcat head this year in an attempt to add spirit and an enthusiastic atmosphere to K-State sporting events.

"I've had a fantastic time," said Scrogin of his portrayal of Willie. "Both my parents went to K-State, and I've been coming to things since I can remember. I like to yell at the games and I've never missed a football or basketball game since I've been at college.

"Trying out to be Willie was a spur-of-the-moment decision. I didn't know how much it would entail, but I thought I had some talent I could put to use."

Scrogin said he tried to develop Willie's character to be one of a funny, athletic ladies' man.

"I look at it (being Willie) as being able to express all the feelings and the aggressions that K-State sports fans have and want to exert against the other team and the other team's fans," Scrogin said.

Scrogin, a member of K-State's junior varsity basketball team his sophomore year, said his height and basketball skills were instrumental in being chosen to portray Willie.

"In tryouts, a lot of people did a lot more comical routines," Scrogin said.

"I divided mine up a little bit more, and one part of it was totally ball-handling — dribbling, spinning the ball on my finger. I could see out of the mask (Willie's head) and see people's expressions like 'Wow, that's new. That's something that would really be exciting at a basketball game.'"

Anyone who saw a K-State basketball game this season will likely remember Scrogin's exhibitions of riding a unicycle, walking on stilts and dunking the basketball — none of them easy and made even more difficult wearing a mascot head.

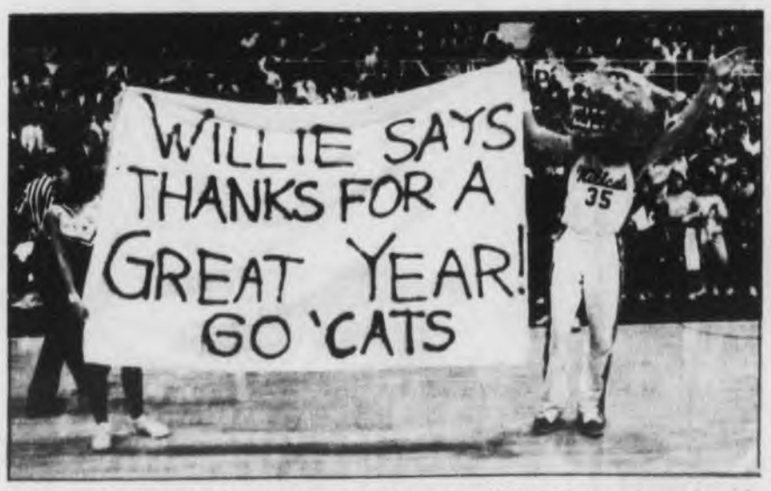
One of Scrogin's more memorable stunts took place when the University of Oklahoma played K-State in Ahearn Field House.

"When Oklahoma was warming up, they were down there dunking away. It's our home court and it was like they were trying to show they own it," Scrogin said. "So I just cut in line and went up there and dunked."

Scrogin has made several public appearances around the state. He traveled to Miltonvale, Kan., after he received a request from the high school basketball coach, who saw Scrogin perform in Kemper Arena in Kansas City, Mo., when K-State played North Carolina.

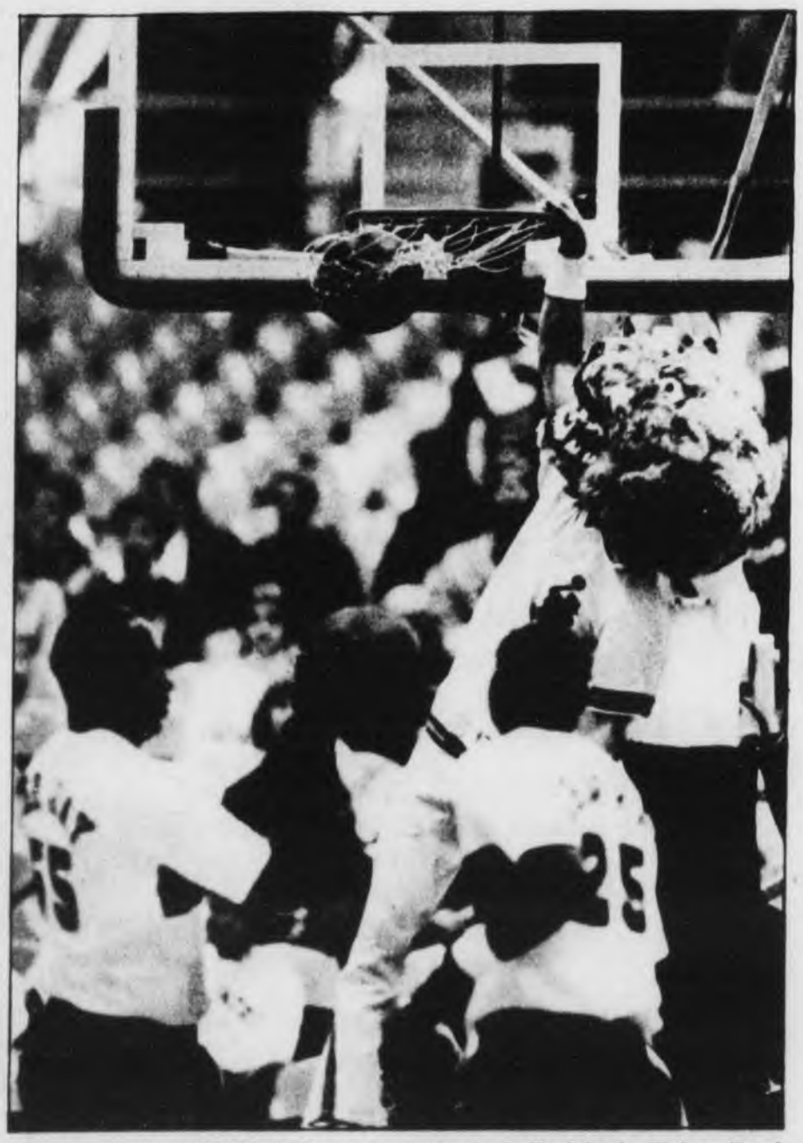
Scrogin also wrote four columns for the Collegian this year as Willie the Wildcat, the only mascot to have done so.

Scrogin said he did this to give Willie a "voice." When he is portraying Willie, he cannot talk to the crowd because he is supposed to be a cat, and cats can't talk.



Scrogin will not try out to be Willie again. He said that although he has enjoyed it, "somebody else doing it for the first time would have a lot more fun than me doing it for a second year."

He plans to stay heavily involved with K-State athletics, however, by working with the I Contributed A Twenty (student booster) club.



"I've really enjoyed meeting kids, taking pictures and signing autographs," Scrogin said. "I've liked being a reason a lot of people want to come to games."

Scrogin's father Jack, who is a K-State graduate, shoots a picture of Scott and cheerleader Kathy Peirce after K-State's final home basketball game against the University of Missouri.

Peirce helps Scrogin show his appreciation to the K-State fans as he makes his final appearance as Willie the Wildcat in Ahearn Field House.

Scrogin uses his athletic ability as he dunks the ball while the University of Oklahoma basketball team warms up for the game against K-State.

Student artwork on display in McCain

By ERIN MULCAHY
Collegian Reporter

The best artwork by nine graphic design seniors will go on display as part of the Bachelor of Fine Arts exhibitions opening today and Sunday.

The Bachelor of Fine Arts exhibit is a graduation requirement for all seniors in art. The two-week exhibition gives seniors the opportunity for public display of their artwork.

Bob Clark, senior in graphic design, Phyllis Coon, senior in graphic design, Mary Lynn Hake, senior in graphic design, Jim Henson, senior in graphic design, Jonna Keller, senior in graphic design and Susie Stegeman, senior in graphic design, open their show this morning in McCain Auditorium. The display will continue through April 9.

The second exhibition begins at 1 p.m. Sunday in Gallery 6 of the Art Building. Three students, Angela Harris, senior in graphic design, Lynn Kirk, senior in graphic design, and Jayne Whitson, senior in graphic design, will display their artwork in this exhibition ending April 12.

The students are allowed to display eight to 10 pieces of their work. The number of pieces displayed and type of art varies with each person, Clark said.

The six students in the McCain exhibition raised approximately $250 through sponsors to help pay for part of the show's expenses, Stegeman said.

"We were hoping for an exhibit during Open House," Stegeman said. "In our exhibit, we tried new things — it's not just pictures on a wall, it's more of an atmosphere exhibit."

"Our show is a surprise," Clark said. "There hasn't been a show like it, and we have other things that go along with our theme."

Gallery 6 will have graphic designs and a few fine art designs on display. The theme is "The Graphics Advantage."

The three students in this exhibition paid for their framing and other expenses for the exhibition. Costs ranged anywhere from $200 to $300.

The students look at their artwork throughout their four years in college and make selections to put in the exhibition, said Carroll Winegardner, assistant professor of art.

Students in graphic design create artwork based on the needs of a client, Winegardner said.

"The student is promoting an idea and publicizing an idea for the client," she said. "Graphic design is an applied art — art to communicate more specifically, and is more a sales communication tool."

The next Bachelor of Fine Arts exhibitions will be April 10-24 and April 24-May 8 in McCain Auditorium.

Free trumpet, bell concert changes performance time

By The Collegian Staff

The University's eighth annual Brass 'n' Bells concert scheduled for 8 p.m. Sunday in McCain Auditorium has been changed to 3:30 p.m. Sunday in the sanctuary of the First United Methodist Church, 6th and Poyntz Ave.

The KSU Trumpet Choir, directed by Paul Shull, professor of music, and the First United Methodist Church Rhapsody Ringers, directed by Joan Shull, will conduct a one-hour concert free of charge.

The KSU Trumpet Choir has 17 members, 15 of whom are University students, Shull said.

Music on the Brass 'n' Bells program will include antiphonal brass, antiphonal trumpet, organ, tympani and handbells.

Account clerk injured in fall

By The Collegian Staff

It took two K-State Police Department officers and two Riley County paramedics to carry an injured University employee out of Anderson Hall Thursday. Because there was no ramp, the four had to carry the stretcher down nine steps on the south side of the building.

Phyllis Mentgen, account clerk III in the Controller's Office, broke her arm when she fell down a flight of stairs. Sgt. Richard Howard said. University police received the call at 5:42 p.m.

Larry Garvin, director of facilities planning, said an access ramp for the handicapped and an elevator are the last things to be completed in the Anderson Hall renovation. He said he expects the renovation to be finished by the end of the semester.

Originally the ramp, elevator, handicapped-accessible bathrooms and a new bathroom to replace the one removed to make way for the elevator shaft were scheduled to be completed by April.

"Right now we are waiting for the heavy equipment to arrive," Garvin said. "The renovation should be done by graduation."

O-State Cowboys bring superb stats into 4-game series

By BILL LANG
Sports Writer

For K-State's baseball team, the weekend series and Big Eight Conference opener with Oklahoma State could easily be described as running into a buzz saw.

Oklahoma State, 18-1, is riding an 11-game winning streak and is ranked No. 2 in the Collegiate Baseball Poll and fourth in the ESPN poll.

If that isn't impressive enough, Oklahoma State is batting .368 as a team and averaging 13.9 runs and 2.5 home runs per contest.

Game one of the four-game series starts at 4 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field. The Wildcats and Cowboys will play a double-header with the first game starting at noon. Sunday the 'Cats will conclude the series with a 12:30 p.m. start.

"Oklahoma State is tough and there is no doubt about that," Coach Mike Clark said. "They are definitely one of the best in the country. It'll be tough to beat them. We'll have to be at our best if we stand a chance."

Oklahoma State Coach Gary Ward sounded not so confident about his team against K-State, which is 10-9 after sweeping a double-header Thursday against Augustana-South Dakota.

"We've played most of our games at home, and that'll help anybody's record if they play most of their games at home," Ward said. "Right now we're just looking for some good playing weather and some good performances out of our kids."

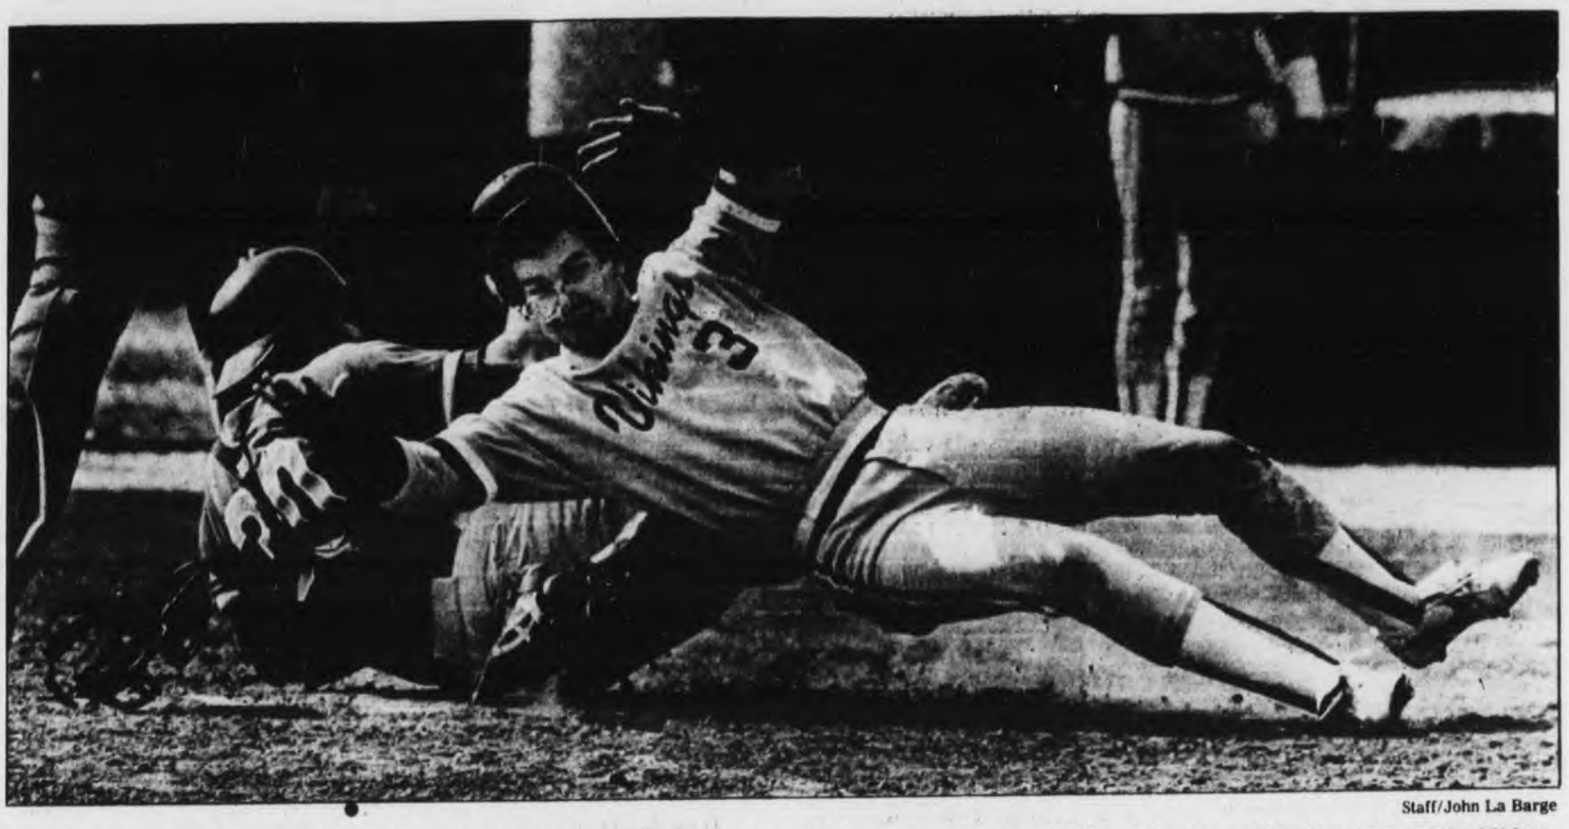
Ward said K-State should finish in the top four this year in the Big Eight. He said the return of Otto Kaifes, Jeff Turtle and Mike Hinkle will be factors in how the 'Cats fare this season.

"With Kaifes, Turtle and Hinkle returning, K-State has a good nucleus to build from," Ward said. "But the team that wins the Big Eight will be the one who gets the quickest jump on winning ball games."

The Cowboys are led by Jim Ifland batting .533 with three doubles, two triples, five home runs and 31 RBI.

As if the Oklahoma State offense wasn't enough to face, consider the Cowboys also have the second-best pitching staff in the Big Eight behind Nebraska.

The Cowboys' staff in 141 innings has an earned run average of 3.45. Oklahoma State is led by Jimmy Long, coming into the series at 4-0 with a 2.44 ERA and 28 strikeouts.



Junior college transfer David Chadd paces the 'Cats offensively, hitting .516 with three home runs and three RBI going into Thursday's game with Augustana-South Dakota.

Jeff Peterson, 2-2, will start the first game of the double-header Saturday. Peterson went the distance for the first time since his freshman campaign in 1985 when he beat Nicholls State, 5-3, on the Wildcats' spring break road trip.

Either Darryl Rowley or Paul Iseman will start the third game, and Mike Hinkle gets the call in the closing game Sunday.

O-State will counter with Long on the first day, Tim Pugh and Mike Gardella on Saturday and Pat Hope on Sunday.

Staff/John La Barge

Mike Grevlos, second baseman for the Augustana Vikings is put out while colliding with K-State catcher Jeff Turtle. The Wildcats, who will battle the Oklahoma State Cowboys Friday, Saturday and Sunday, defeated the Vikings 18-0, 18-8 in Thursday's double-header.

Wildcats maul Vikings twice

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

If K-State was looking for a confidence builder before this weekend's series with Big Eight Conference rival Oklahoma State, the Wildcats found it last night at Frank Meyers Field.

Going into yesterday's game 8-9 overall, and coming off a 2-7 spring break tour, the Wildcats were striving to protect their undefeated home record of 4-0 as they met Division II-member Augustana College of Sioux Falls, S.D., 0-4 overall.

K-State, thankful for the breather in its schedule, swept Augustana 18-0 and 18-8.

"This shouldn't hurt our offense as a confidence builder," said K-State Coach Mike Clark after his 'Cats pounded out 36 runs and 28 hits in the two games.

In the second game, the scenario wasn't so glamorous during the early going of the contest.

Choosing to start junior outfielder Tom Parsons at pitcher for the first time in his college career, Clark said he knew things might be rocky in the early going.

"(It's tough) when you beat a team 18-0 and here (you start the second game pitching) a kid who hasn't thrown since high school," Clark said.

That was obviously so as the Vikings pounded Parsons for four runs in the first inning, answered by only one run from the Wildcats in the bottom of the first. Things did ease up for Parsons, though, as he surrendered only one run in the second and none in the third.

He remained in the game through the top of the fourth inning, giving up three more runs, until being replaced by Zack Kimbell, who finished the inning for the 'Cats rather effortlessly.

Things didn't seem to improve for K-State in the bottom of the fourth as it suffered two outs in the early going — until the vans of Oklahoma State showed up just beyond the left-field fence and several Cowboys began looking on.

"I told (Oklahoma State coach) Gary Ward that when they came over I was sure glad they did because we weren't playing any ball before that," Clark said.

At this time the 'Cats had one man on base with two outs, and were down 7-1. With junior Jim Donohue on first, two successive walks to Russ Ringenburg and Kent Gleason concurred with a Mike Hinkle left-field single that scored Donohue and Ringenburg, bringing the score to 7-3.

From there it was the power slugging of senior Jeff Turtle who hit a home run to center field that dropped in three more runs for the 'Cats. Following Turtle came Otto Kaifes, who started things rolling again with a single, followed by a home run to center field by Leo Seiler, giving the 'Cats their first lead of the game of 8-7.

K-State scored twice more before Hinkle popped out to close the inning. The 'Cats were up to bat 30 minutes in the inning.

In the first game, the 'Cats were lead by the shutout pitching prowess of Mike Hammacher, who allowed Augustana only seven hits and no runs.

Hammacher maintained his spotless record at 2-0. Vikings' hurler Jim Plumhoff dropped to 0-1.

K-State basketball team tabs Rebels to wear NCAA crown

By RON RENO
Sports Writer

Chalk up K-State men's basketball team as yet another squad impressed by the University of Nevada-Las Vegas after going down to defeat at the hands of the Runnin' Rebels.

In a survey of Wildcat players and coaches, UNLV was the overwhelming choice to be the champions of this year's NCAA Final Four in New Orleans.

UNLV plays Indiana in one semifinal Saturday, while Big East Conference rivals Providence and Syracuse square off in the other contest. UNLV has also been tabbed a favorite by oddsmakers.

"I was convinced after they beat us and after they came back like they did (against Iowa) Sunday," said senior Percy Eddie, referring to UNLV's comeback from 19 points down against the Hawkeyes.

Added the Wildcats' other senior Lynn Smith, "They have that chemistry. They play that press defense for 40 minutes and they shoot well from the perimeter. They've also got that big guy (Armon Gilliam) in the middle, and they've got a great floor leader (point guard Mark Wade)."

The Wildcats, who fell to UNLV, 80-61, in the second round of the West Regional in Salt Lake City, cited various reasons why they expected the Runnin' Rebels to prevail.

Despite Vegas' reputation as a bunch of gunners from beyond the three-point range, it was the Rebels' work on the defensive end that was mentioned most often.

"Their defense impressed me a lot," said point guard Steve Henson, who had the unenviable task of bringing the ball up the court against the Rebels.

"I really think UNLV is the team to beat," assistant coach Dana Altman said. "I think their defensive pressure will be too much for the other teams to handle."

Assistant coach Greg Grensing also talked about the Rebels' pressure defense, but added, "I think their mental toughness is surprising. Mark Wade doesn't let them lose very many games...And I think destiny is a little on their side. I think they're gonna give (head coach Jerry) Tarkanian his just desserts."

Only two of those surveyed didn't select the Runnin' Rebels to romp to victory.

Assistant coach Ron Stewart, an University of Indiana alumni who admitted he might have a bias, said, "I would pick Indiana because I would never bet against (head coach) Bob Knight when he has a week to prepare for a game — even when they're playing the athletes they have at Vegas."

Stewart said despite others' contentions to the contrary, he expected the Hoosiers' All-American guard Steve Alford to be able to score against the Rebels' defense. He said Alford faced similarly aggressive defenses during the regular season against several of the better teams in the Big 10 Conference.

Head coach Lon Kruger sided with Stewart, though he gave Indiana only a slight edge over UNLV.

"(Indiana is) a tough-minded group," he said. "Their expectations are high, and they're not awed by being there, but neither is Vegas."

"Bobby Knight is a great coach," said forward Mitch Richmond, "and they're playing well right now. If anybody can beat them, it's Indiana."

The respondents were split as to who would take the other semifinal, but they agreed that either Syracuse or Providence would have difficulty matching up with the winner of the UNLV-Indiana contest.

K-State's outdoor track campaign starts in Texas

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

The K-State men's and women's track teams departed Thursday for their first outdoor meet of the season — Texas A&M's College Station Relays — but will be without the services of most of their distance runners.

"We're going to give them this one off because they've raced in cross country and indoor track and I'd like to give them a break between the indoor and outdoor season," K-State head track coach John Capriotti said.

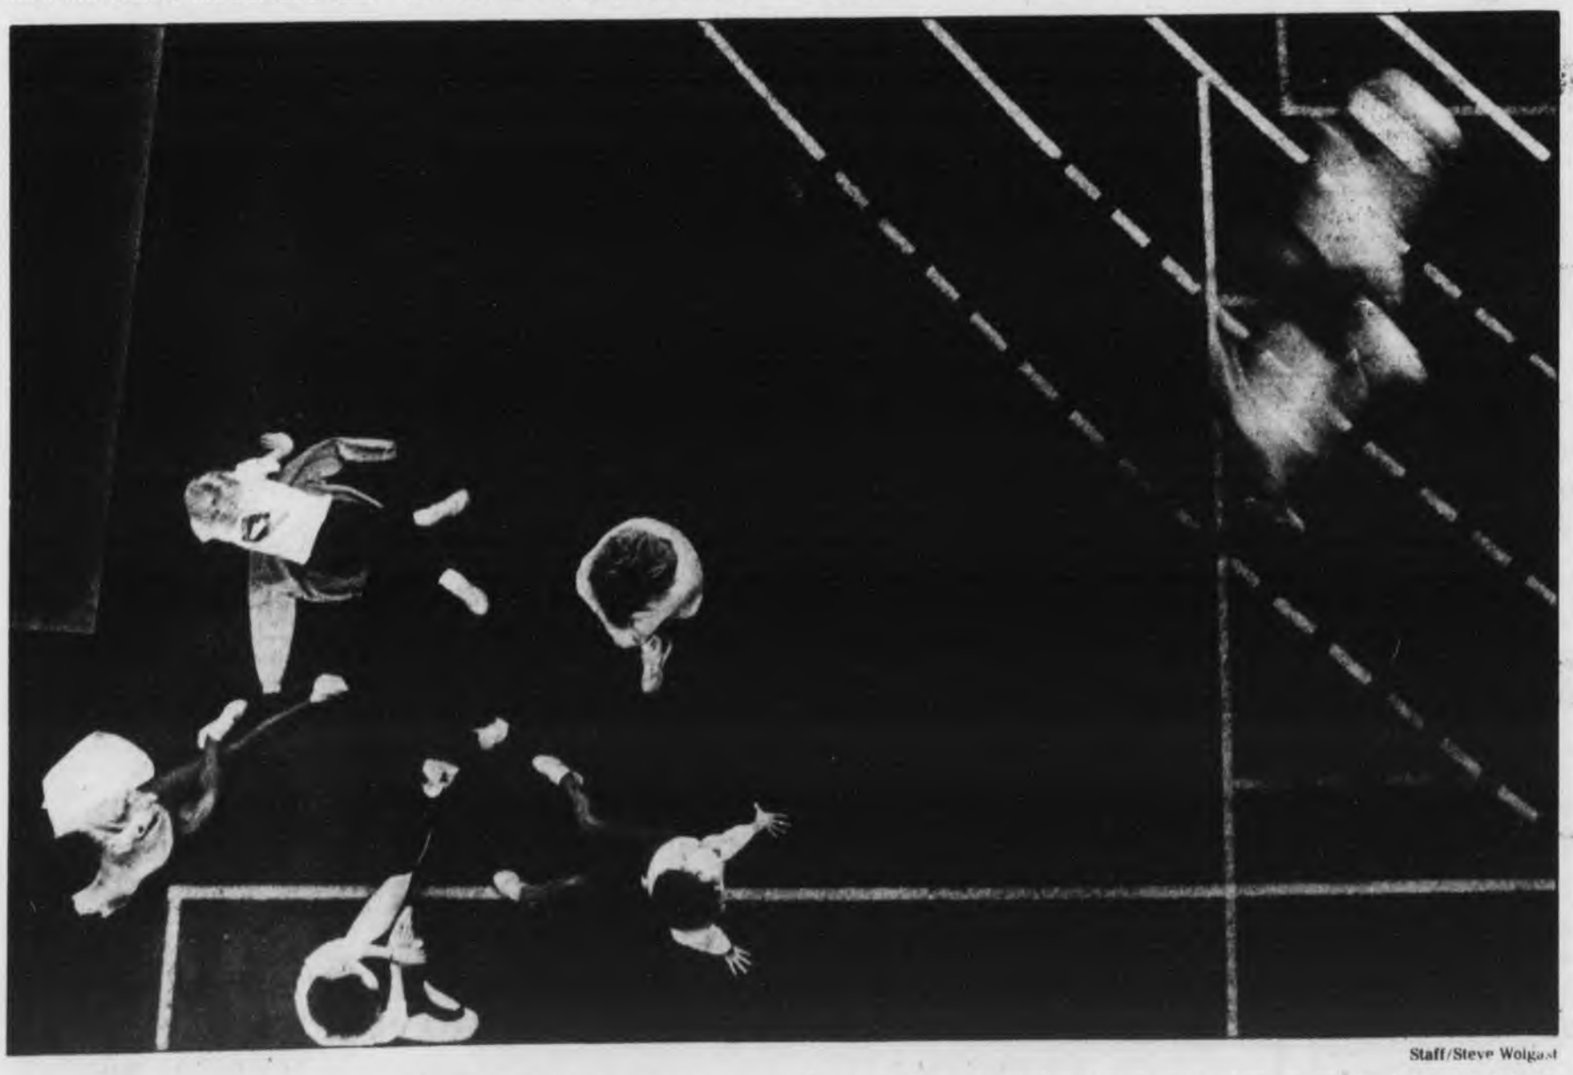
The lone distance runner competing for the Wildcats this Saturday will be senior Jacque Struckhoff.

Struckhoff, who was held back from last season's track competition with a stress fracture in her leg, will compete in this meet to test herself for future competition.

"Jackie's going because she just started her season because she redshirted during the indoor season to give her a chance to train better for the outdoor season. She did run cross country this season but she never really got in shape," Capriotti said.

Because the meet is a non-scoring competition, Capriotti conveyed no feelings of regret for giving his distance runners a rest.

"We try to stay away from scoring meets, because we're looking for efforts instead of team scores. We'll look for scoring at the Big Eight meet. Other than that, we'll just get the kids into the competition they need to develop and get better throughout the season," Capriotti said.



Key competition mentioned by Capriotti for the meet included schools such as Southern Methodist, Baylor, Texas, Oklahoma, Harvard, Southwest Louisianna, Arizona State, Rice and Houston Baptist.

"This will be a very good season-opening meet. The competition will be very good, especially in the long-jump and sprint events. I think we will hold up very well against the other teams in the meet," Capriotti said.

Among the changes for the men's team is the return of junior college transfer Jeff Reynolds in the middle distance events after suffering an injury during the indoor season.

Outdoor meets also have the javelin, discus, decathalon, and 10,000-meter run not contested in indoor competition.

Spring Track Schedule
March 28 — Texas A&M College Station Relays.
April 4 — KSU/Pepsi Open.
April 9 — Ward Haylett Junior College Invitational.
April 11 — SMU Invitational.
April 17-18 — KU Relays.
April 24-25 — Drake, Penn and MountSac Relays.
May 2 — K-State dual.
May 15-16 — Big Eight Championships.
June 3-6 — NCAA Championships.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

Although the outdoor track season opens today, these distance runners, warming up at Ahearn Field House before their daily workout, will get their first chance to compete next weekend at the KSU Open. Sprinters and field athletes open competition this morning at Texas A&M University.

Wildcats preparing for Big 8

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

Coach Steve Bietau said the K-State women's tennis team is using its final outing before the opening of the Big Eight Conference season next Friday as a preparation match.

The Wildcats, 5-4, are scheduled to meet Kearney State at 1 p.m. Saturday on the outdoor courts at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area.

"What we are doing now is focusing on things we need to do to be ready for (next Friday's match-up with Oklahoma)," Bietau said. "Once the Big Eight starts, it really flies by and you can't make any significant changes at this point in season."

The Wildcats were scheduled to face Northwest Missouri State and Kearney State Wednesday in the KSU Invitational. But weather prohibited the match from being played.

In the last meeting between the two teams, K-State easily defeated Kearney State. But Bietau isn't looking for it to be as easy this time around.

"Kearney is a team we need to beat," Bietau said. "They have some pretty good athletes, but if we play well we should beat them."

After coming off a successful spring break road trip, he said the team is confident and ready to play again.

High school students to give speeches on science projects

By The Collegian Staff

Middle school and high school students in six Kansas districts will meet March 28 through April 4 to discuss the scientific projects on which they have been working.

Each year students originate their own research on a scientific topic and write a paper on their findings, sponsored by the Kansas Academy of Science, the College of Education and the Department of Chemistry.

"There are many students interested in science who would like to work on a research project but who have no idea of how to proceed," said Emmett Wright, head of the Department of Curriculum and Instruction and director of the Kansas Junior Academy of Science. "The junior academy helps them get started in science or math research and provides the opportunity to present results of their research at a district meeting."

The junior academy is an organization for students interested in science and math who wish to enhance their ability and accomplishments in these fields.

Students conduct research in different science areas including physical, biological and psychological sciences and compose a paper to present at a district meeting at the end of the school year, Wright said.

K-State houses the operation and offers a 3-day summer program in which the students can work with scientists on campus, he said.

Every spring, each of the six Kansas districts holds a meeting where students report on their projects. The papers are judged and awards are given for the best paper. The author of the winning paper is invited to present at the state Junior Academy of Science meeting scheduled for April 30 in Wichita.

This year the district meetings will be held in Hays, Wamego, Overland Park and Altamont.

Recital to receive new twist

By The Collegian Staff

Katie Pfister, senior in music theater, will add a twist to the normal format of a senior recital and stage a mini production at 7 p.m. Sunday in Nichols Theatre.

"This is the first for undergraduates," she said. The music theater degree itself has only existed for two years.

For her recital, which she prefers to call a "show" including costumes and props, Pfister said she used a play, "Cues From Carolyn," written by instructor of speech Charlotte MacFarland. Using the second act, she wrote around the plot and chose songs to go with it.

"I didn't want to do it like a regular recital, with someone standing up and singing, because that's not what music theater is," she said.

Most of the recital will be sung because Pfister's music theater option is within the music department. She will be judged for a grade by a panel from the music department, and some theater professors will also critique her performance, Pfister said.

Production and publicity also made up Pfister's duties in preparing for her recital, she said.

Enroll

change suggested by the athletic department.

"One is to try to better coordinate the advising of the athletes," Foster said. "Secondly, the athlete, in order to continue participating, must meet very stringent NCAA requirements each term.

"Thirdly, particularly at varying times of the year...there are several athletic teams...that travel away from campus quite a lot. Therefore, the amount of time they have to enroll is reduced because of that travel time. So they really don't have the opportunity to move between enrollment and their advisers like students normally do," he added.

Foster said the student-athlete is the only group on campus that has such stringent academic requirements.

"With the typical student you have some options in terms of when you take courses. With an athlete, they must complete 24 hours of degree credit every year," Foster said.

"For instance, you have standard progress for financial aid. Requirement there is that you complete so many hours. So in terms of whether they're directly applicable toward your degree doesn't figure into that. With the student-athlete it does."

In addition to meeting hour requirements, student-athletes must carry a mimimum GPA to be eligible for competition. Big Eight Conference and University standards require athletes to carry a 1.6 GPA for 60 hours or less and 1.8 for more than 60 hours.

Foster said there would be no danger of classes being filled by athletes before enrollment opens.

"Reason being, there are 300 athletes and their academic curriculums are scattered across the University. So the chances of them filling up any one section sure would be rough," he said.

Foster, who discussed the change with the college deans, said their overall reaction was positive.

"The only concern expressed was that it looks like we're setting up the student-athlete for special attention, and we quite agree that we are," he said. "But we feel that's a reasonable trade-off for the activities they have to participate in as an athlete in order to retain their scholarship."

"When a bird is in a stressful environment, its immune system is low, and the birds are more susceptible to disease," he said.

When the birds have recovered, they are sent to the rehabilitation center in Salina for final evaluation of their flying ability. If the birds show signs of problems they are returned to K-State for further tests. If no flying problem is detected, the birds are released.

that the University incorporate an on-campus documents disposal program. He also said if such a policy is adopted, a person with a history-related background should be appointed to oversee the policy's implementation.

"Right now there's no official policy about the transferring of material from offices but it has been proposed for the University archives to make the final decision," said Tony Crawford, assistant professor of the library and University archivist.

Crawford said campus offices are now working with him at the University archives when there is question of the importance of retaining documents.

Last fall a committee was formed to discuss the possibility of appointing an individual or group responsible for deciding what University documents should be preserved and destroyed, but no decision has yet been made, Thompson said.

Faculty Senate passed a proposal Feb. 10 stating any photographs taken of public activities should be destroyed immediately.

Higham said he strongly objects to this proposal.

He said the photos are historic documents and should be kept, not necessarily by the police, but possibly in the University archives.

"My concern is as a historian. I'm concerned about preserving pictures and any University documents that may aid someone 10 or 20 years from now," he said.

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. "A Room with a View"

This film has received eight Oscar nominations, including Best Picture, Best Supporting Actress (Maggie Smith), and Best Director (James Ivory). It's about a young lady (Helena Bonham Elliot) who is engaged to a priggish fop (Daniel Day-Lewis). During a trip to Venice she meets a working class young man (Julian Sands) and falls in love, in spite of and because of her chaperone (Smith).

"The Fly"

Jeff Goldblum was robbed when he didn't receive a Best Actor Oscar nomination for his role in this film. The love story which develops between him and Geena Davis is a surprisingly mature one for the science fiction genre.

Unfortunately, director David Cronenberg puts way too much emphasis on the special effects. After Goldblum's matter transfer experiment goes awry and his own genes are combined with those of a fly, he begins an incredibly grotesque transformation.

"Stand By Me"

This was one of the sleepers of 1986. The film was directed by Rob Reiner, of "All In The Family" fame, and stars a cast of newcomers including River Phoenix.

Based in the early '60s, it's a coming-of-age film about four kids and their search for adventure in the Montana countryside.

Full of child-like antics and humor, it exudes a warmth and innocence that's rarely found in films today. Named after the Ben E. King classic, the soundtrack is full of nostalgic tunes, and the movie itself is well worth a look.

"Wise Guys"

Speaking of sleepers, this film will put you into one. Danny De Vito and Joe Piscopo are two bungling mob associates who are pingponged between kingpins and thugs in Atlantic City.

The script is awful, the characters are weak and even the mobsters are flimflam. Though crammed with chase scenes, the story itself goes absolutely nowhere. Neither did this film.

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

The band plays a wide variety of jazz from over 500 charts (musical arrangements), McFarlin said.

For example, the band played music from the swing era at a dance concert for the Kansas Bar Association's annual banquet in January. At Rip & Mo's, CJE plays pieces with many difficult rhythm passages and extended solos including a lot of improvisational jazz, he said.

"They can play whatever is put in front of them," McFarlin said of his musicians.

McFarlin stresses versatility, choosing music of many styles including swing, blues, contemporary jazz and big band.

Riat said he enjoys the variety of music CJE plays and believes others in the band do too.

"You can't lock yourself into one style of playing," he said.

Many of the pieces include improvisational solos. Connaitre Miller, graduate in music performance, and McFarlin scat with the band. Scat singing is a jazz term for improvising vocally with syllables.

Even when Miller sings a ballad like "Georgia on My Mind," she takes certain liberties with the melodies. The songs are never sung the same twice, McFarlin said.

The diversity of the music is equalled in the personalities and professionalism of the members of the band, Riat said.

Robert Fry, associate professor of chemistry, is an avid jazz enthusiast and trombone player and has made his music library available to the band. Fry plays in a local jazz band called the Little Apple Eight.

Fry's charts are dance hits such as "In the Mood" from Glenn Miller and others from the swing era — from the '30s through the '50s. Since most of CJE's music is concert-oriented, the dance music gives the band a larger variety of music to play, McFarlin said.

"The entire year has been spent generating funds. Everything (the group has done) has aimed at the trip," McFarlin said.

"We certainly aren't there yet, but we do see the light at the end of the tunnel," McFarlin said of the $25,000 needed for the trip. The group is "close enough to make it happen," he said, but each member will pay $500 toward his trip.

"People in this area are mostly exposed to top 40 hits. For those of us who appreciate jazz, it's really nice to have a place to go and hear it live," said Wally Brockhoff, junior in agricultural economics.

McFarlin said the Tuesday night sessions in Aggieville give the group a chance to get out of the classroom and into the nightclub atmosphere, where he believes the students play better.

Although there are several jazz groups at K-State, the CJE is the top jazz band, McFarlin said. William Harshbarger, assistant instructor of music, and McFarlin choose ensemble members from auditions.

Two lab ensembles give students the opportunity to play in a jazz band. Miller, in addition to singing and playing keyboards in the CJE, conducts the lab bands.

Other money-raising projects are the jazz ensemble's four "Jazz Chili and Spaghetti Feeds." Customers will have the opportunity to listen to jazz during their meals. Local merchants are donating everything for the feeds.

The group is also scheduled to perform a benefit concert April 15, with all proceeds going toward the European tour.

'Doing the Montreux festival will be the pinnacle of the trip...What is represented there is the top of the cream of jazz performance in the entire world.' — David Riat

Music Review

Club's tunes leaning on chart success

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

Off-shoot bands are an old story in the music biz.

The group: the Timex Social Club. The conflict: a faulty contract for a wildly successful 12-inch single. The result: the original group becomes two.

The Timex Social Club is still around but their efforts haven't received anything like that of former member/producer Jay King, his recruits and their new band, Club Nouveau. And with good reason.

Their debut album, "Life, Love and Pain," is impressive in that it was slapped together with a very tight budget, on a small label and, largely, with new talent.

The group is responsible for the played-to-death "Rumours," but because of contract problems, that song isn't on the LP. Fear not, however, the electro-clattered "Jealousy" — the same song but with different lyrics — is.

The debut single, "Situation No. 9," received a lot of club play, but the song's tempo is so slow that it makes one wonder if the rpm is meant to be sped up like the Prince cult hit "17 Days." As to what "Situation No. 9" really means though, is anyone's guess.

The already overplayed "Lean On Me" is a remake of the '70s Bill Withers classic. Nouveau easily does it justice with King's creative flair for fun on both vinyl and video. It starts out with a somber accoustic piano and kicks into a funkified, reggae-flavored ditty. This cut, plus their contribution to "Rumours," exemplifies the band's crossover potential.

The album has two gems, and ne is the ballad "Let Me Go." ng by the sole female of the oup, it has a slick but soft ghtclub feel and at the same time n't corny or overwrought.

The latter cut, "Heavy On My Mind," is a slow-fast duet that really beefs up the LP. It's slinky, smart, seductive and it only has one calorie. Even though there's not that much weight to the song, its tempo and counter rhythm will grab dancers and non-dancers

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

Nouveau

The downside is that Club Nouveau is basically a studio band. They've done little touring and their ranks may still change.

As far as the album goes, they're practically all over the place. As with most offshoot groups, (Arcardia, Stone City Band and The Firm) their sound isn't tight or distinctive yet. As with the S.O.S. band and their earlier works, fine tuning is definitely needed and easily heard.

In some songs, lyrics are hackneyed and too many words are crammed into a line. Often the thin, sometimes tone-deaf vocals simply don't hold up to the really nice stuff behind them.

Jay King, the man behind Nouveau, wrote, produced, arranged and mixed (not to mention financed) the entire "Life, Love, and Pain" project. In spite of a rocky beginning, with more of the same sweat and chemistry that started the band in the first place, Club Nouveau could soon be very dangerous.

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Edward J. Frick — a witness to all but 19 years of the 20th-century at K-State and in Manhattan.

Resident's life reflects local developments

By The Collegian Staff

Edward J. Frick has given a lot to Manhattan.

From the College of Veterinary Medicine to housing development to the Sunset Zoo, Frick has helped build Manhattan and K-State into what they are today and through his life one can peer into the history of the University and the city it calls home.

Joining the veterinary medicine faculty in 1919, he taught until his retirement in 1966. Hence, all but 19 years of Manhattan's and K-State's 20th-century history has been witnessed first hand by Frick. In fact, a first-time visitor to the area could get a good introduction to the "Little Apple" just by listening to him recount the events in the community which have touched his life.

A GROWING UNIVERSITY

During that life, he has witnessed numerous changes in the University and its administration.

Under the guidance of six University presidents, William M. Jardine, Francis D. Farrell, Milton S. Eisenhower, James A. McCain, Duane C. Acker and Jon Wefald, Frick watched the physical expansion of the University through construction and curriculum additions.

Completion of Kedzie Hall, the first college building in the United States to be constructed exclusively for the instruction of home economics, set off a series of projects that added 15 buildings to the campus, according to one reference on the history of the college.

Since 1912, the College had included divisions in Agriculture, Home Economics, Engineering and Architecture, General Science and Extension. In 1919, a sixth division, Veterinary Medicine, was added. Frick was hired that fall semester and stayed until the spring of 1966.

Frick began his teaching career in Leasure Hall, the main veterinary building at the time.

Since then, the University has changed with each new classroom and research building as it was added to the campus horizon. Although students today often cannot tell a visitor anything about the person for whom particular building is named, Frick can talk a long time about who they were, what they taught, what kind of teacher and person they were.

Some of the buildings like Throckmorton, Call, Farrell and Dykstra were named after "honest-to-goodness heroes," Frick said.

"Those were men who were dedicated professors, experienced individuals who did a lot for the college," he said.

Twenty years after retiring from a formal academic schedule Frick still keeps his finger on the pulse of K-State, watching and commenting on its development.

"The University is growing," Frick said. "It's changed from an agricultural college to a university since it has all branches, the arts and the sciences.

"They've put more emphasis on arts than they used to and that's good," Frick said. "But if we had stayed in agriculture we could have probably been the finest agricultural college in the country...which maybe we are now but we would have been the king pin of agricultural colleges if we hadn't branched out into areas like commerce and some of the other fields we have developed."

A CHANGING VET SCHOOL

While Frick occupied a place on the vet med faculty, the scope and mission of that school changed to meet the times.

Frick began teaching veterinary medicine during a time when the cattle ranchers controlled Kansas politics and education. Understandably, the cattlemen were more partial to large animal medicine rather than small animal treatment. At the time Frick joined the veterinary faculty, small animal disease classes were banned.

"In those days the cattle kings ran Kansas. They don't today — I don't know who runs Kansas today. But the cattle kings...controlled the state and I couldn't teach small animal diseases because I would have been fired.

"If they would have found out someone was teaching diseases of dogs and cats they would have gotten rid of them in a hurry. I was a small animal specialist when I came out here from the New York Women's League for Animals and I had to teach small animals on the side. Now, small animals is a major part of the curriculum."

Women, too, were a rare item in the Division of Veterinary Medicine. And while sex discrimination is a serious offense these days, Frick remembers why he actively opposed women entering the field.

"It was very necessary to graduate veterinarian students because otherwise they couldn't work. The women who entered the field kept out men who needed to get in. And although the women were often smarter than the men, they didn't have the capability to handle the larger animals," he said. "They did fine with the smaller animals but the emphasis at the college was large animal not small animal."

Now, the emphasis is on small animal medicine with more than 60 percent of veterinary medicine students being women, he said.

CITY SERVICE

Although Frick has pursued an active career of teaching, research, and publication at the University, he has also played a crucial role in the city, both making and watching its history.

Even while he continued to teach full time, he took on responsibility for three abandoned mules and in cooperation with city administrators began to build a city zoo, which he directed for 50 years.

By hook and coercion Frick led friends of the zoo (later to become an official booster club) on a pursuit to provide the city of Manhattan with the Sunset Zoo.

"Friends of the Sunset Zoo is an organization of everybody not just college people," he said. "I didn't want it to be an offspring of the veterinary division. I wanted it to be Manhattan Sunset Zoo and that was the main thing. There is a lot more that can be done."

Frick has also helped expand the city of Manhattan, pursuing a career in housing development not wholly unrelated to his job at the College of Veterinary Medicine.

When Frick began teaching, his first year's salary as an associate professor came to $1,800. He knew he had to do something extra, especially after his marriage in 1923 to Dr. Ruby Engle, one of the country's few osteopaths.

"I knew that you couldn't ever retire or get any place on $1,800 a year. I couldn't pay for my home. I was smart enough to realize I had to make some money on the side," Frick said.

Consequently, with financial advice from friends and bank presidents, Frick began to buy and sell small parcels of real estate. His usual targets were old houses where he could hire students to renovate the interiors and then resell the homes. To date he has bought and sold more than 75 houses in Manhattan.

Living in the city since 1919, Firck has had the chance to witness the bad times as well as the good. Yet, he said, some changes in the city which first appeared as detrimental turned out for the best in the end.

He remembers one time in particular where what looked like a bad situation turned into a second chance for some of his farmer friends. During the damming of the Blue River to form Tuttle Creek Dam and Reservoir, farmers who would lose their land and homes sided against townspeople in favor of the project.

"The town was pretty divided because we knew it would be a loss to certain branches of the town," Frick recalled.

However, he remembered, the project produced some good results for the farmers and the town.

"(Some of) those farmers up there...were poor and in debt and when they sold their land to the government they became well-to-do and they moved away. That was a loss to Manhattan and yet it was a gain because some of the farmers were bankrupt."

Although Frick has watched and been involved in the growth of Manhattan as a city, he said he expects it to change more in the next five years than during all the time he has lived here.

"Because of the mall and the new highway and the sidewalks we're over $6 million in debt right now. We are doing too many things all at once and so Manhattan right now is either going to be a busy city or it's going to be a little one-horse college town."

TOWN-GOWN HARMONY

Frick, then, has occupied positions of importance in both sections of Manhattan — the city and the University. Unlike some locations where the conflict between town and gown can be severe, Manhattan and K-State have had a mutually beneficial relationship, Frick said.

Such a relationship has come about, he said, because representatives of both sides have been careful to maintain balance.

"The relationship is very good in this town," Frick said.

For an example, he cited the composition of the local Rotary Club.

"We have one Rotary club with 256 members and it's too large a club for this size of town but if we broke it up one club would be all college and one would be all town," Frick said. "This way roughly half of the club membership is college-oriented. If the college or the town gets too dominant then it wouldn't be good, it would be lopsided. This way it includes manufacturers, business people, farmers, and college people.

"That's where I've had an advantage all my life because I've been in the business circle and with the farmers and in the college circle."

From his overall experience in his years in the community, Frick has found the city to his liking.

"Manhattan is a nice Midwestern city and we want to keep it that way. This is a wonderful state to live in and I wouldn't want to live in any other place. Although there are places with a better climate than Kansas, I don't think there's any place with better people than Kansas."

New, renovated buildings to enrich campus

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Agriculture Editor

Students attending K-State in the next two years will be able to say they were the first to enjoy the advantages provided by two new buildings and an extensively renovated building.

Those students will be the first to sit in a 13,500-seat coliseum, take a chemistry laboratory class in a new building and take a meat science class in a modern facility.

The Fred Bramlage Coliseum and a new chemistry/biochemistry building are scheduled for completion in the fall of 1988, said Vince Cool, associate director of facilities planning.

FRED BRAMLAGE COLISEUM

Construction on the slightly more than $17 million coliseum began in October 1986 and is expected to be completed in July 1988, but plans for the dedication and opening are scheduled for October 1988, Cool said.

"We've had an excellent winter. The weather has cooperated 100 percent and we've hardly missed a day of work," Cool said. "We are on schedule and doing well."

The concrete pier work, shafts going into earth that are part of the foundation, should be done by the end of March and the workers plan on erecting steel in June, he said.

The coliseum's outer appearance will be a bowl-type construction and the seating arrangement will be an oval bowl format.

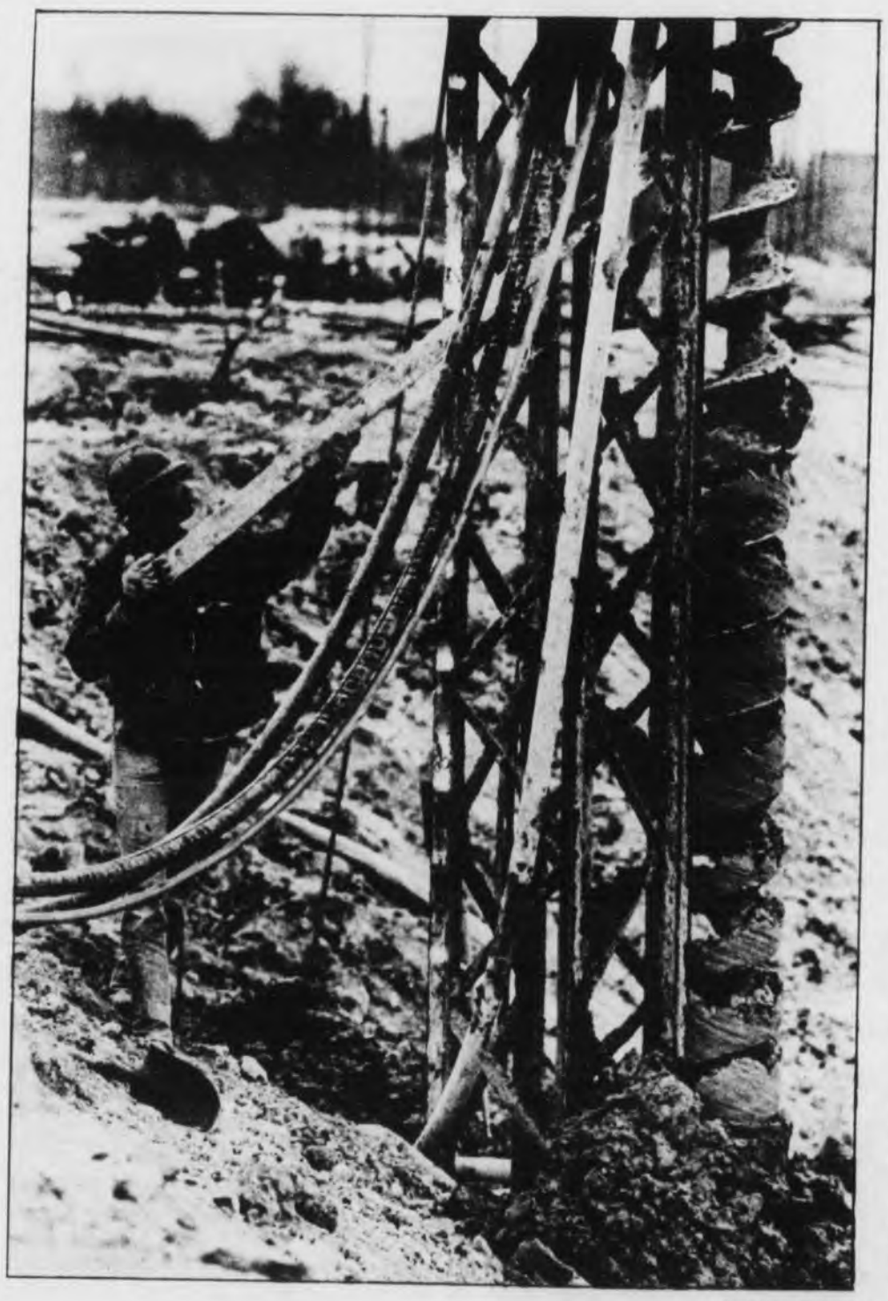
Visitors and patrons of the coliseum will enter through the upper concourse, the seating high point, and walk down into the coliseum, Cool said.

Construction plans include pouring the concrete for the seating on the ground. No locker rooms, restrooms or offices will be located underneath the seats.

A two-story building at the south end of the coliseum will house the dressing rooms and administrative offices, Cool said. Basketball coaches, trainers and the athletic director will move from Ahearn Field House to the offices located in the coliseum.

The first basketball games scheduled to be played in the coliseum will be during the 1988-89 season. Ahearn will house its last basketball game in the spring of 1988.

"Ahearn will generally be used as it is, except for the playing of basketball games and practices," he said.



Events to continue in Ahearn include volleyball, indoor track, intramural activities and other events that can be scheduled for Ahearn.

"Bramlage Coliseum will be an added improvement for K-State," Cool said. "It will be an attraction for the K-State campus."

CHEMISTRY/BIOCHEMISTRY BUILDING

The chemistry/biochemistry building being constructed north of King Hall and east of Willard Hall will house the undergraduate laboratory classes.

Currently, the building does not have an official name, but one will be given to it by the time the dedication takes place. Dedication should occur shortly after the building is completed, scheduled for August 1988.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

A construction worker employed by J.E. Dunn Contractors cleans mud and dirt from a drill bit at the Fred Bramlage Colliseum construction site south of the KSU Stadium.

The four-story structure will cost a little more than $10 million, Cool said.

The current building is only the first phase of a two-phase plan. The second-phase structure will be located south of the first building. No funds for the second-phase structure have been appropriated yet by the Legislature, Cool said.

Some offices will be located in the building, but it will mostly contain labs and some instrument rooms, Cool said.

"Undergraduate lab classes were our highest priority, so that is what we decided to use the building for," he said.

Chemistry graduate and faculty research labs will be located in Willard Hall, and Burt Hall will house the biochemistry graduate and faculty research facilities.

Permanent equipment is being installed during the construction, Cool said. Some movable equipment will be purchased with the $200,000 made available for that purpose, he said.

WEBER HALL

A $7.2 million addition and renovation project for Weber Hall began in March 1986 and is scheduled for completion in the fall of 1987.

"We are still shooting for the set target date of August 1987 for completion," said Melvin Hunt, professor of animal sciences and industry and academic building chairman.

"We are pressing the schedule because of the complexity of the project," Hunt said. "We will have access to the renovated portion of Weber when classes start in the fall, but we may not be in the new part until September or October."

Fall classes are being scheduled to meet in Call Hall and will move to Weber Hall when the addition is completed.

"We will be in Weber for at least half of the semester," he said. "Some classes will have to be reorganized to include the meat lab participation segment at the end of the semester."

With the new addition and renovation of the existing building, a variety of classrooms with unique characteristics and laboratories will be found in Weber Hall.

Classrooms for lectures, demonstrations and combination lecture/laboratory sessions will be available for the students and faculty, Hunt said.

"We will have classrooms that provide carcass and meat viewing," Hunt said. "For example, we will be able to demonstrate meat fabrication by moving equipment into the classroom, demonstrate and move the equipment back out."

Computer facilities and an audio-visual room are two new classrooms that will be

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

Bar caters to non-alcoholic crowd

By DERON JOHNSON
Collegian Reporter

For Russell Disberger, the opening of Polo's, a non-alcoholic bar in Aggieville, is the culmination of a year-old dream and a lot of work.

For people in Manhattan under the legal drinking age, Polo's is a much-needed entertainment option.

Disberger, senior in finance and co-owner of the establishment, said he originated the idea of a NAB bar nearly a year ago, even before similar bars opened in Salina, Topeka and Lawrence. The bar, located at 1122 Moro St., in the space formerly occupied by the bar Mannequin's, opened about six weeks ago.

"Basically, (we wanted) to create a place where people want to go and dance without alcohol," Disberger said. "And it's also for those who are underage." In fact, he said, the bar's initial success is largely attributable to a crowd unable to gain admittance into "21" bars.

"Definitely the drinking age has something to do with it."

However, he maintains the bar's greatest selling point is a facility equipped with a 1,600 square foot dance floor, 6 foot television screen, high technology lighting and live bands.

He said the bar serves typical mixed drinks such as Fuzzy Navels. All, of course, are sans alcohol.

In addition, Disberger said Polo's is to have a restaurant serving "basic drive-in" fare including burgers, pizza and "anything you can cook with a grill and fryer."

Disberger said he expects his concept to succeed.

"The first night I had over 450 people here. From the way everyone's talked and the rumors everybody's heard, it'll be even better in the future," he said.

He said right now the average crowd is composed of senior high school students and underage University students. He said no one below high school age is admitted to the bar.

"As of now, the high school crowd is the most supportive bunch," he said. "But we're shooting for the college crowd."

In an effort to net the important college crowd, Disberger said the bar will have college nights when only college-age students will be admitted. Also, he said several greek organizations have reserved nights at the bar because they aren't allowed to serve alcoholic beverages at greek functions.

Although he is unsure of the money the bar will make, Disberger said he intends for it to be a profitable operation.

"I hope to run it like a business. I hope to make money," he said. "There's no guarantee.

"I honestly don't think I'll lose money. I think I'll have enough people to support it."

However, he doesn't expect to make a quick profit.

"Time will sell it. It is an asset to Aggieville and Manhattan."

Although he has been faced with minor problems, such as people taking alcohol into the bar and dealing with drunks who come to the bar, the business venture has been positive. Furthermore, he said the bar's justification goes just beyond monetary.

Illustration by Greg Crawford

"I might save somebody's life," he said. "I'm not condemning alcohol. It's just a place to go."

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said use of alcohol is a significant societal problem. He said a 1984 survey showed 101 million people, or more than 60 percent of the U.S. population, said they had consumed alcohol. Moreover, he said a K-State survey of 550 students indicated that 94 percent had a drink in the past year.

However, the trends indicate drunk driving has gone down, he said. He said 475 convictions occurred in 1984 and 351 in 1985 in Riley County. Statistics from 1986 have not been compiled yet.

"Something is helping because the numbers are showing a decrease," Arck said. Although he said educational groups like his can't necessarily take the credit for the decrease, "it would be hard to prove that what we're doing is bad."

Arck said there is reason to believe the NAB bar concept will be successful. The same K-State survey indicated 50 percent of respondents would support a NAB bar.

ILL-GOTTEN GRADES

'Most of the kids are just as honest as the day is long, but there is always that rotten apple in the barrel that makes life miserable for everybody.'— Stan Elsea

STORY BY CHRIS STEWART

His office was broken into six times, probably by students looking for the easy way out. Looking for copies of the next exam.

The culprits didn't net any tests during the midnight raids, but managed to steal away many personal belongings, and one professor's faith in the honesty of some K-State students.

The office's tenant, Daylin Butler, assistant professor of management, is one of a growing number of campus educators becoming seriously concerned with academic dishonesty at the University.

He has since moved to another office in Calvin Hall, where monitoring of the building has been increased due to the incidents last semester.

"We discovered more cheating last term than any term since I've been here," Butler said.

Dishonesty is an old problem, one which begins young and becomes increasingly complex at a time when one's maturity level should increase.

Honest students, professors and employers agree, cheating hurts everyone involved.

It is hard to come up with an exact number of students who cheat, but it is known students cheat on anything — including faking class attendance, using crib sheets on tests and plagiarizing papers.

A combination of four surveys conducted during the 1986 fall semester shows 33 percent of those students questioned believe there is a problem with academic dishonesty at K-State, and 69 percent know a cheater.

The University penalties for cheating allow officials to dismiss those caught, yet few are punished to the full limit. Don Foster, University registrar, said only about one student a year is actually dismissed from school for academic dishonesty.

"We don't know how many are cheating, but whatever the number, a vast majority are honest, decent folks, who are trying to rise and fall on their own efforts," Butler said.

Many professors agree most cheating takes place in the large lecture classes where students can slip into anonymity.

Richard Harris, professor of psychology, said in large classes "people feel less accountability to the class and to the teacher. They are less likely to be disappointing somebody by trying to cheat."

Butler, who has 249 students in his senior-level Business, Government and Society class, sees cheating as a symptom of a much larger problem: inadequate funding for higher education.

"Getting our budgets back to reasonable levels would allow us to get our classes back to a moderate size," Butler said.

Another drawback of academic dishonesty is the many hours consumed by professors to ensure a small percentage of a large class doesn't cheat, could be used to teach more material — making students better prepared for graduation.

"There is no way in the world the faculty can put a stop to this type of thing because there are not enough of us and there are too many other things that need doing rather than play policeman.

"In order to attempt to defeat the efforts of half of one percent of my students, I have to write two or three forms of an exam. I have to make you show your ID card to turn your exam in. I have to count the pages to make sure you turn them all in. I have to allow you to go out one door of the room so that I don't have somebody getting up and sneaking out of the back door with one copy of the exam," said Stan Elsea, assistant professor of management.

"It's just ridiculous. It's just a waste of my time. I could be helping (students) find jobs or writing better lesson plans, or doing research," Elsea said.

Cheating probably hurts the honest students the most, and those are the ones who can put an end to the problem, Elsea said.

"Ultimately it is going to have to be the students who are usually the ones aware of this going on. They are going to have to say to their fellow student, 'Hey sport, you're hurting me when you do this. Either you knock it off or I turn you in."

Elsea knows of only one case where a student turned in another for cheating, but has had other instances in which students express concern about cheating in a particular class.

"The thing that concerns me most is that you are the people I am going to have to work with. You are going to be running the organizations I am going to have to deal with the rest of my life. I don't want to have to look over my shoulder all the time to see

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

where you guys are. Those people who come by good grades dishonestly in the classroom are hurting the rest of the people in the class who try hard on their own and don't come up with a A or a B, but end up with a C."

Honest students will echo this sentiment about the quality of workers who cheated their way into the job market.

"(Someone like that) would cause me to work harder if I had to cover for them. I'd probably turn them in," said Larry Schmidt, graduate in mechanical engineering.

"A lot of instructors grade on a curve, then people who come by their grades dishonestly push that curve up and cause other people to get lower grades. At the end of four years you suddenly find yourself competing with people who have better grades than you have. One of the very first things a recruiter looks at is grade point average. That's not always the best indicator in the world of what kind of person you are, however it is the one really quantitative thing a recruiter can put his hands on to give some sort of an indication of the quality of the recruit.

"So if a person has a better GPA than you have and they came by it dishonestly, that person is going to get the good job and you're going to get the next-best job," Schmidt said.

Harris is concerned some people may not see anything wrong with cheating. He said the possibility exists that schools haven't been tough on cheaters, and that parents have not taught those values in the home.

Harris used plagiarism as an example.

"People are not as likely to really understand the morality of (plagiarism). They are supposed to read an article and write a reaction to it. They honestly don't understand what is wrong with most of the paper being copied out of the article," Harris said.

"Most of the kids are just as honest as the day is long and I trust them with my life in most cases, but there is always that rotten apple in the barrel that makes life miserable for everybody," Elsea said.■

Students, professors recognize test cheating

By KIM GREENWOOD
Contributing Writer

Only 33 percent of students think there is a problem with cheating at K-State, yet 69 percent know of someone who has cheated in some way.

This statistic, along with the others presented in this article, reports the combined results of four surveys taken by students at K-State during the 1986 fall semester. However these results cannot be considered statistically accurate.

Although the four surveys did not contain identical questions concerning cheating, the results represented the opinions of 340 students on similar issues.

Students responded that cheating included looking off someone else, using crib sheet, using a stolen test, having someone else take a test for them, sharing answers, using plagiarized material and consulting notes or texts during an exam.

Three of the four surveys asked specific questions on what kind of cheating is most prevalent. The two techniques with the highest response were copying answers from someone else and consulting crib sheets.

Two surveys specifically asked if the unnamed, unidentified person being polled had ever cheated. Almost half of the respondents admitted to cheating.

Twenty professors from the business and agriculture colleges responded to a survey on cheating. Sixty-five percent felt cheating on exams was a problem. In addition, 70 percent had caught someone cheating.

When asked whether cheaters should be expelled from the University, 30 percent responded yes for first-time offenders, 15 percent said yes for repeated offenders, 15 percent responded no cheaters should be expelled and 40 percent of the professors failed to answer the question.

According to the Faculty Senate Academic Honesty Committee Report approved May 9, 1978, when an instructor has proof of a student cheating, he is to consult with his department head before making any accusations.

If the department head believes there is sufficient evidence to prove cheating, the student and the instructor are called in. The department head is to act as a "fact-finder and adjudicator" in the matter.

If the department head thinks the cheating resulted because of the student's ignorance of "academic custom and University rules," he should admonish the student and write a memo of the case to be placed in the student's record until graduation.

The student receives no credit for the coursework in which cheating occurred. The student should be given the chance to do the work properly.

If the department head decides the academic rules were intentionally violated, a summary of the case should be drafted and submitted to the student's dean. The summary should be signed by the department head, the instructor and the student.

The student's dean can decide the case, and act upon the decision. If the decision is suspension or dismissal from the University, the case must be reviewed by the Undergraduate Grievance Committee.

Once cases have gone through any part of this process and guilt determined, the decision will be entered into the student's record, but will not go on the transcript unless the disciplinary action is suspension.

The Undergraduate Grievance Committee keeps a record of the case including signed statements for "consulting by authorized parties if subsequent need arises."

Penalties for those guilty of cheating are:
— "Cheating on an examination or paper, if proved, minimum of "F" for the examination or paper; maximum of dismissal from the University."
— "Cheating on a final, if proved, minimum of "F" for course; maximum of dismissal for the University."
— "In a second proved instance of academic dishonesty, suspension from the University for a year is automatic, dismissal from the Unversity the maximum penalty assessable."

Faculty markets old tests

By The Collegian Staff

Editor's note: This article is being presented in the view that the use of old tests is considered cheating by some and not by others.

When shopping for doughnuts or ice cream, people visit Shellenburger Hall and Call Hall, respectively. But if someone had wanted to buy an old math test, they could have gone to Cardwell Hall.

The Department of Mathematics held a one-time clearance sale of old tests on file at the beginning of February.

"We had a bunch of surplus exams from the last 10 years or so, and we just decided to sell them off," said Louis Pigno, department head. "It was a one-time only shot. We no longer have any exams, and we won't be selling any for a long time.

"If it wasn't for the budget cuts, we might be giving (the tests) away," said Wendell Curtis, professor of mathematics. The math department sold the tests for less than what it would cost to copy them.

"They cost us something to produce. We were just trying to recapture a little bit (of the cost)," Pigno said. "We thought this was a good way, and it would benefit the students."

"There was a table as you went in the front doors of Cardwell. The staff and instructors were selling the tests for a quarter each," said Kent Oldham, sophomore in electrical engineering.

Oldham, who is enrolled in Differential Equations, said he purchased the second test and the final exam given last semester.

"I thought, what the heck, finals aren't easy to come by," he said.

Courses from which the department had tests ranged from Intermediate Algebra to Differential Equations, the highest-level course included.

"A lot of tests are on file, but they usually don't sell them from a stand as you walk in the door," Oldham said. "Everyone I've talked to finds it humorous."

Religious groups help college students cope

By ERIN EICHER
News Editor

For many students, a re-examination of religious faith is a critical part of the transition from home life to college.

"Students are in the process of separation from their families. A number of students leave their traditions and explore a number of other faiths and traditions," said the Rev. Don Fallon, coordinator of religious activities on campus.

"Many, in finding their own identity, don't go to church at all. They're concerned with values and the meaning of life, but they break away from the institutional church," he said.

Limited time is also "of a critical essence," Fallon said. "The high stress they're feeling in terms of studies, of jobs and economics makes them very intense in terms of their own goals, and they don't get involved with the church."

However, campus ministers and church support groups are a good resource to help students deal with doubts and concerns, he said.

Whether through Bible study groups or regular worship services, many students become involved with the church again during their junior and senior years after they have "struggled through," Fallon said.

"As they grow in their own maturity, they begin to settle into a faith community again."

Weekly worship services for members of various denominations are held on or near campus. Daily 4:30 p.m. Roman Catholic masses and four weekend services are conducted at St. Isidore's University Parish, 711 Denison Ave., where the Rev. Norbert Dlabal "prepares about 100 couples a year for marriage."

Danforth Chapel, southwest of Anderson Hall, is the location of Protestant worship services at 10:30 a.m. Sundays and Episcopal services at 5 p.m.

The Manhattan Jewish Congregation, 1509 Wreath Ave., holds worship services at 8 p.m. every other Friday. In addition, a 10:30 a.m. service will be held Saturday, March 28.

Five daily prayers are offered at the Muslim Mosque, 619 Sunset Ave. Friday evening congregational services are held weekly.

"Frequently in our services our emphasis is to relate the Christian faith to issues students are dealing with like personal relationships, peace and justice issues, separation from parents, stress, sexuality, purpose and goals in life, and how faith impacts those personal concerns," said Fallon, who conducts Protestant services in Danforth.

Fallon said he has seen more students become concerned about issues like human survival, nuclear disarmament, hunger, racism and women's rights. There is increased concern about these "faith matters," evident both in individuals and groups, he said.

Members of several denominational groups on campus meet for discussion of faith issues, social activities and Bible study.

Denominational organizations for students include the American Baptist Campus Ministry, B'nai B'rith Hillel (Jewish), Ecumenical Christian Ministries (Methodist, Presbyterian, United Church of Christ and The Church of the Bretheren), Latter-Day Saint Student Association, Lutheran Student Movement, Mennonite Student Group, Muslim Community Association and Newman Ministries (Catholic).

The 50-member American Baptist Campus Ministry sponsors a Monday noon non-credit class called Sack Lunch Theology, in which social and faith issues are discussed, said the Rev. Dave Stewart, the group's adviser. The group also sponsors a bi-weekly Women's Spirituality Seminar.

Hillel, a Jewish student group, has 20 to 30 active members of a potential 200 on campus, said David Margolies, assistant professor of entomology and faculty adviser for Hillel.

"We encourage students to get in touch with us. Mostly graduate students respond," he said. "We try to be as visible as we can and say, 'Hey, here we are. If we're doing something you like, come join us.'"

Margolies said Hillel serves a "political function" as well as a religious one.

"Being a Jewish presence on campus, we try to be visible on issues that concern us — issues that deal with Israel, although we have many different views on that, and events in the United States."

"This is a diverse society that we live in. We're here as part of that diversity," he said.

As one of the group's activities, ECM invites faculty to present a Living Ethical Will, an opportunity to express thoughts, ideas and opinions that "they want to leave with the rest of us," said the Rev. Rod Saunders, the group's adviser.

Students involved in the Latter-Day Saint Student Association can take classes in religion at the Institute of Religion, 1820 Claflin Road, to supplement their secular education at the University, said Thomas Parish, professor in the Department of Administration and Foundations.

The group of about 50 members also has social events like video nights and hamburger fries which "allow them to feel at home away from home," said Parish, who teaches in the College of Education.

The members of the Lutheran Student Movement serve as a support group to relate faith to personal growth, said Fallon, the group's adviser. The 15 members meet weekly to participate in social activities and discussion regarding faith development in current issues.

Between eight and 15 members of the Mennonite Student Group hold weekly meetings in a member's home, said the Rev. Dorothy Friesen, the group's adviser.

The meetings, attended by mostly upper-level students, include Bible study, discussion, prayer and social activities, she said.

One of the most important activities of the Muslim Community Association is "to provide some funds for a brother or sister who is in need," said Eyyad Nasralla, senior in management and one of about 30 members of the group.

The 150-member Newman program provides Catholic students with a way to get acquainted and make friends, Dlabal said. The group sponsors service projects, retreats and dances.

Four interdenominational groups cut across religious boundaries to unite a diverse group of students. Campus Crusade for Christ, Icthus, Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship and the Navigators hold social meetings and Bible studies.

Campus Crusade holds small group Bible studies weekly "to help people grow in their relationship with God and train people to have a ministry with others," said Terry McKinney, campus director for Campus Crusade.

The 80 to 100 participants in the group have opportunities for summer travel overseas or to different tourist areas in the United States, McKinney said. He said the national organization sends 75 people to find jobs in an area and "seek to be a positive influence in the community."

Icthus, a statewide interdenominational Christian organization, is a "fellowship group to encourage people to walk with Jesus personally," said member Marcia Sloan, fifth-year senior in landscape architecture.

The group has weekly meetings attended by 50 to 100 people at which members sing, share personal testimony and listen to speakers, Sloan said.

Members of Icthus also have "special ministries" to the elderly, junior high and high school students and international students, she said.

Interest in Inter-Varsity Christian Fellowship is on the upswing again after almost dying off in recent years, said large-group coordinator Gerald Schmalzried, junior in electrical engineering.

The student-run organization's weekly meetings and Bible studies are open to the public, he said. Most of the 25 to 30 active members are graduate students, but Schmalzried said the group is seeking a larger freshman membership.

Members of the Navigators also have travel opportunities. In January, 25 students had a "wild and crazy trip" to Mexico to help build a new church, said the Rev. A. W. Pickle III, area representative for the Navigators. He said the trip "opened students' eyes to poverty."

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

Manhattan mall schedules October opening

Town Center plans to incorporate 80 stores

By JONI MANLEY
Collegian Reporter

As the grand opening of the new mall approaches, progress is varying. While two stores may open early, others are still in contract negotiations.

Manhattan Town Center is scheduled to open Oct. 26, 1987. However, the J.C. Penney Co. Inc. and Dillard's department stores could open ahead of schedule, said Karen Davis, assistant director of community development.

Although the mall will house 80 shops, there is room for expansion if other department stores want to move into the mall area, Davis said.

Mall representatives are currently negotiating with stores interested in opening branches in the new facility.

Of the 80 shops, 11 are to be restaurants. Eight of those are currently in negotiation processes, said Chris Heavey of Forest City Rental Properties Corporation, Cleveland, Ohio.

The Forest City Rental Properties Corporation and JCP Realty, New York, are the developers trying to attract businesses to Manhattan Town Center.

The J.C. Penney store is being constructed by Osborne Construction, a local company. The Dillard's store is contracted through Kelly-Nelson Company, Little Rock, Ark. The mall itself is being constructed by Law Company, Wichita. Of the mall's 304,000 square feet, approximately 121,000 square feet will be occupied by J.C. Penney and Dillard's.

Construction slowed last year when Manhattan received heavy rains which prevented construction companies from working, Davis said. However with nice weather early in March, construction is going well.

"We gained a lot of time with the nice weather," Davis said.

Although downtown merchants are not quite sure how the new mall is going to affect them, Davis said it can only help them.

The mall is "definitely a bonus to everyone," she said. It is expected to create a lot of new jobs for the city. The estimated employment rate for the new mall is 774 new permanent jobs and 644 temporary construction jobs.

The mall is going to raise the property value of Manhattan. It will also help in recruiting other businesses and industries to move into Manhattan which in the long run will bring in more employment to the city, Davis said.

The mall project is working with the Main Street Project to help the downtown stores and the city work together. The intent of this project is to bring downtown merchants and the mall merchants together — not pull them apart, she said.

Davis also said she believes the mall will be a big attraction to prospective K-State students.

The mall will help the Manhattan community by bringing in prospective shoppers from surrounding areas and by offering them big department stores with the comforts of a dry, cool climate, she said.

Davis said although people like to go out of town to shop, the mall will provide local residents the ability to buy what they need from a major department store.

Residence hall trickery, pranks 'just for fun'

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

It usually starts late at night. The phone rings at one end of a corridor in the residence hall, then gradually, as the prank phone caller rouses his victims from sleep, he or she continues to call each successive room by exchanging a new digit in the last place of the number called.

Trickery or pranks are a common occurrence in the residence halls, and they are something freshman should anticipate when they plan to live in the dorms, many dorm residents say.

Jim Koger, junior in marketing and advertising and Haymaker Hall resident assistant, said most people pull pranks because it's fun to see the reactions they get from others.

"People want to see if they can get a rise out of somebody," Koger said. "As a staff person, I can't promote pranks, but they do happen. Most of the time, they're just for fun."

In addition to standard pranks such as putting shaving cream on telephone earpieces, pranks done by telephone are one of the most common forms of trickery, Koger said.

"We've had guys on a floor calling other guys who were being loud and telling them they were Haymaker staff and they were going to write them up if they didn't quiet down," Koger said.

"There was also this guy who would always call us and say he was from KMKF and we could win a prize if we answered his question correctly."

Pam Neuschafer, junior in history and social chairman of eighth floor in Ford Hall, agreed the telephone is used quite often for pranks.

"I think the most popular phone prank is one where the prankster calls a room and says the pizza man has an order for them in the lobby. Some people fall for it. We did it to some freshmen this year," she said.

"Some people have also called saying they were taking surveys, then asking personal questions to find out 'the dirt' on people they called," Neuschafer said.

"When I was a freshman living in Ford, we would get these calls all the time from guys who knew every move we made, like, when we went into a room, when we went out. We finally figured out it was some guys over in Haymaker who were watching us with binoculars," said Marnie Horn, junior in marketing.

Another popular dorm prank is stealing people's clothes or towels when they are taking a shower, said Katy Hail, freshman in construction science.

"One time, we took this girl's towel when she was in the shower, so she used the shower curtain and wrapped it around her to get back to her room," Hail said.

Clothes have also been taken from people's rooms for a prank, said Denise Urbanek, senior in journalism and mass communications and West Hall resident assistant.

"When it's someone's birthday, people often take all the clothes out of their closet or drawers and hide them," Urbanek said. "It's mainly to see what kind of reaction they can get."

"One April Fool's Day, we took this Haymaker guy's underwear, then we packaged them and called him, saying he had a package at the front desk of Haymaker," Neuschafer said.

"A lot of the pranks that go on are between Ford and Haymaker," she said.

Many of these pranks include toilet papering each other's lobbies and rooms, she said.

Two freshman Ford residents who wanted to remain unidentified said they succeeded in toilet papering a human being.

"This girl was asleep sitting in a chair in the Ford TV room, so we covered her with toilet paper," they said.

Terry Still, senior in construction science and Haymaker resident, said pranks done to rooms are also quite common.

"There are the standard pranks, such as putting shaving cream in someone's bed. We've also had guys preoccupy someone while they move that person's furniture out to the lobby," he said.

"Short sheeting and putting powdered sugar in beds are often done at Ford," Neuschafer said.

"People have also been papered into their rooms," Urbanek said. "A prankster will cover the doorway with newspaper or wrapping paper, and when the resident opens her door, she has to break through the paper to get out."

Another prank involves sprinkling powder outside someone's door, then blowing it into their room with a blow dryer or fan, Koger said.

"You can call a prank like that harmless, but even the powder gets all over people's rooms and they have to clean it up," Koger said.

"Some pranks can be dangerous, such as filling a bathtub with water and dunking people in it, which is now against residence hall rules. Most pranks are frowned upon in the dorms," Urbanek said.

Neuschafer said that many of the old standard pranks that have been done for years are still as popular today.

"People still like to shortsheet beds, put vaseline on doorknobs and so forth," she said. "But some people have gotten creative and invented such things as putting powdered sugar in people's beds and hanging string lined with toothpaste outside doors so people will walk into it and get the sticky paste all over their ankles."

"It's a fun way to kill an evening," she concluded.

Diversity available in Manhattan restaurants

By CHAD L. SANBORN
Staff Writer

Whether a student on the go or someone with a natural aversion to the kitchen, Manhattan offers such a wide variety of restaurants that it may be possible to eat out all semester without slipping into a dinner rut.

Food quality is relative to the individual, but atmosphere and price remain fairly constant. Atmosphere and price are the absolute characteristics that make or break a restaurant.

There are well over 30 eating establishments in Manhattan. But who really cares about the national chains? A McDonalds' burger from the Little Apple tastes like a McDonalds' burger from the Big Apple.

People really want to know about the local restaurants. It is the variety of atmospheres that keeps people going to local restaurants. And for the college student, price may be the biggest factor.

Al-Basha Greek and Mediterranean Foods, 1209 Laramie St., is open 11 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day.

This small restaurant offers the best Greek food in town. It also offers the only Greek food in town. It is a very neat and clean place with moderate prices. Any self-respecting eater can dine for less than $5. Because it is unique, everyone should experience it at least once. Pronouncing the names of the food is an experience within itself.

Al's Deli, 718 N. Manhattan Ave., is open Monday through Friday 11 a.m. to 7 p.m., Saturday 11 a.m. to 4 p.m.

For a change from the assembly line deli sandwich, go to Al's. This quaint place offers a good selection of reasonably priced sandwiches. It is a good place to meet a friend for a sandwich before shopping in Aggieville. The food has to be good because Al, not some part-time college student, makes the sandwiches himself.

Cafe LaGrande, 606 N. 12th St., is open Sunday through Thursday 11 a.m. to 10 p.m., Friday and Saturday 11 a.m. to midnight.

This place serves basic Americanized Mexican foods: hard- and soft-shelled tacos, burritos, nachos, etc... The atmosphere is quasi-Spanish (Did Cortez play video games?), but the food is not very expensive. Furthermore, the tables and floors are strikingly clean.

Chef Cafe and Restaurant, 111 S. Fourth St., is open 6 a.m. to 9 p.m. every day.

This place runs more daily specials than a person can count. There is no need for a menu because the specials are scrawled on numerous chalkboards hanging on the walls. The prices are a tiny bit above what a college student would call reasonable, but the long dining bar in the front makes this an appealing place.

Kreem Kup Store, 1615 Yuma St., is open Monday through Friday 8 a.m. to 9:30 p.m., Saturday 9 a.m. to 9:30 p.m., and Sunday 11 a.m. to 9:30 p.m.

Every town needs a burger and ice cream shack like this. This tiny little restaurant serves almost every kind of grilled American sandwich imaginable. If that isn't enough, they serve all the basic ice cream treats: chocolate shakes, vanilla ice cream cones and such. Luckily, most of the prices are kind to billfolds.

Hibachi Hut, 608 N. 12th St., is open Monday through Thursday 11:30 a.m. to 9 p.m., Friday and Saturday 11:30 a.m. to 10 p.m., and Sunday 5 to 8 p.m.

Variety best describes this cozy restaurant. A person can spend anything from under $5 on a meal to $12 on just a fillet mignon. They also offer a good variety of foods. Besides sandwiches and steaks, a person can take a culinary trip to Louisiana with some Cajun-style food. Eight or 10 different sauces are at each table.

La Casa De Los Vera, 308½ Vattier St., is open 11 a.m. to 9:45 p.m. every day.

This is a fun place. The atmosphere is mellow, but the jukebox makes it interesting. College is supposed to be a cultural experience and this is a good place to encounter authentic mariachi music. For a quarter, anyone can hear about love, pain or partying as only Mexican music can relate it. Of course, the lyrics are in Spanish. Needless to say, the food is Mexican, as well as reasonably priced. For $5 a person can walk away satisfied and humming.

Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon, 1213 Moro St., is open 11:30 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. every day.

Rather than serving the food on plastic foam as does a fast-food restaurant by a similar name, plates are the norm. The place has a mid-1950s feel to it. The jukebox plays only old blues, old country and old rock-a-billy tunes. The prices are reasonable, and the coffee is good.

That is a good sample of places that would interest the average college student who isn't afraid to try something different. But there are times when a loose attitude and low prices don't apply. When the folks come to town, it is time to splurge. They've got the club cards and they are buying the food. Make them pay.

Bobby T's Restaurant and Fundrinkery, 3240 Kimball Ave., is open 11 a.m. to 3 p.m. and 4 to 9 p.m. seven days a week.

This private club reciprocates with almost any other club in town. The atmosphere is ideal for a bar in Colorado — lots of wood furniture, and a well-stocked bar. The oldies jukebox should appeal to young and middle-aged parents who wish to dine to music from their time period. (No one can choke down food while listening to Madonna whine.) This place isn't just for special occasions, though. Every Wednesday night they serve a 16 ounce T-bone for $4.49. Yeah, no kidding.

Kennedy's Claim, 2304 Stagg Hill Road, is open Monday through Friday 11 a.m. to 10 p.m., Saturday 4 to 11 p.m., and Sunday 11 a.m. to 10 p.m.

This is a private club where everyone lets their folks take them. Make reservations, but do not be alarmed when you have to spend some time in the bar. Remember, the folks are picking up the tab.

Yen Ching Restaurant and Private Club, 1005 Seth Childs Road, is open 11 a.m. to 9:30 p.m. weekdays, 11 a.m. to 10:30 p.m. weekends

A nice change from the usual steak routine, parents go crazy for this place. Just let your folks know in advance that they don't have to take their shoes off.

Memo implies North handled Contra funds

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — At least one wealthy contributor who gave money to a private Contra aid effort believed Lt. Col. Oliver North, then a White House aide, was controlling how the funds were spent, documents show.

A note from the contributor to an employee of conservative fund-raiser Carl "Spitz" Channell included a $100,000 check and said, "Please have Ollie contact me to let me know what he's going to do with it."

The note, dated May 27, 1986, was among documents obtained from Channell's offices by Jane McLaughlin, who worked as a fund-raiser for Channell.

The documents, which McLaughlin has turned over to the independent counsel investigating the Iran-Contra affair, were reviewed by The Associated Press. They indicate a more active role by North in Channell's operation than previously acknowledged by Channell, whose activities are under scrutiny by the independent counsel.

McLaughlin would not comment about the documents.

Channell has maintained that North did not raise or control money for his operations, which included a $1 million pro-Contra TV campaign, a Contra speakers program and humanitarian aid contributions estimated at $3 million throughout the two-year congressional ban on U.S. military aid to the Contra rebels in Nicaragua.

The contributor who asked that North telephone him, Bruce Hooper of Philadelphia, acknowledged sending McLaughlin the note with a $100,000 check.

Hooper declined in a telephone interview to elaborate on the note or on his understanding of Channell's relationship with North other than to say, "I had a sense that ... they were cooperating between each other about those funds."

Channell's spokesman, Jared Cameron, denied North controlled the money or played a significant role in Channell's efforts. He said North was a "source" of information for Channell because both men were working for President Reagan's policy of supporting the Contras.

He has said Channell and North met up to 14 times, always at the White House, when North was giving presentations to Channell contributors about the situation in Central America.

However, the documents show North also met individually with contributors and wrote letters to thank them and encourage support.

Clubs offer international insight

By SARAH KESSINGER

Understanding and appreciation of the world's people is exactly what the K-State International Club wants. Through various gatherings, members of the group attempt to promote an international atmosphere open to all nationalities.

The club, founded in 1980, has tried to unify all internationals, including U.S. students. It is the only organization for all people, althnough there are also campus groups for students from a particular country, said Sudeep Dharan, senior in computer science from Singapore.

"We're trying to get American students involved as well," Dharan said. "We had a square dance last year which was a great way to get American students in to meet some members from other countries.

"People get this concept that international club is only for foreigners, but it's open to Americans, Germans or whomever."

Activities include dances, picnics and potluck dinners.

The next event is a potluck dinner April 4 in the International Student Center at the north end of campus. It will be organized by the International Coordinating Council, an umbrella committee for the International Club and foreign student groups.

"The potluck is another great way for anyone who wants to taste great food," Dharan said. "There were 60-70 dishes of foreign countries at the last one we had, and you only have to bring a dish to try all these different kinds of food."

Sami Dabbas, junior in electrical engineering, and Dima Hamarneh, senior in horticulture therapy, serve food during the Arabian Night. The event was sponsored by the Association of Arab Students one of K-State's international clubs.

The International Club currently has 75-80 members, Dharan said, noting the good attendance at most events. The groups allots a $100 scholarship for one member each year.

Dharan said the club offers a lot to a student by allowing them to see other cultures through their people.

There are also other campus groups under the ICC made up of many of the more than 870 international students at K-State. These organizations, which usually serve specific nationalities, include the African Student Union, the Association of Arab Students, the Chinese Student Association, the European Student Association, the Japanese Student Association and the Muslim Community Association.

It will provide an attractive research area for graduate students, Hunt said. New research laboratories will be available for physiology, monogastric nutrition, muscle biochemistry and analytical services research.

The addition will be a two-story structure with 23,000 square feet of new, usable space, Hunt said. The first floor will contain the meat processing facilities, and a couple of classrooms and laboratories will be located on the second floor.

"With the new meat lab area, we will have a beginning to end meat processing procedure," he said. "We will go from live animal to carcass to processed meats and fabrication.

"It will be a joy to stand in front of a class in these new, modern facilities," Hunt said. "It will be fun for us (the faculty) and fun for the students."

ANDERSON HALL

Currently, Anderson Hall is undergoing construction to make the building handicap-accessible.

The construction began a year ago, and so far, ramps have been installed at the south enterance to the building. The ramps lead to the basement where an elevator will allow handicapped people access to the rest of the building. The elevator shaft has been completed, Cool said.

"We are waiting now for the installation of the elevator itself," Cool said. "The project should be completed by this spring."

Public observes University's qualities

By TED MCFEETERS
Collegian Reporter

A constant drizzle and low temperatures Saturday didn't dampen the annual All-University Open House.

Many students, parents and alumni traveled through rain and snow from around the state to attend the Open House festivities.

For Norma Pettijohn, Topeka, Open House was a time to see some familiar faces at the Kansas State Alumni Association luncheon, as well as tour the campus.

"We toured McCain Auditorium and the residence halls because these are the places that will be affecting our daughter who will be attending K-State in the fall," Pettijohn said.

Each spring, K-State hosts an Open House, allowing each college and other campus organizations to show off their "goods" to high school students, alumni and the public.

Kelly Lamborn, senior in journalism and mass communications and student coordinator for Open House, said Open House '87 was a great success despite the inclement weather.

"Open House is the single largest event K-State has that directs itself to opening doors to potential new students, so we tried to target Open House at high school juniors and seniors," Lamborn said.

Jack Stoerman, a senior from Bishop Miege High School, was looking at the College of Business Administration because he is planning on majoring in finance and economics.

"I really enjoyed meeting the faculty and students at Calvin Hall and the K-State administration," Stoerman said. "So many people were able to get information on just about anything."

Mike Conry, graduate in chemistry, ignites a soap bubble filled with hydrogen during a chemistry magic show at Open House.

Tami Barham, admissions representative who mainly recruits high school students in the Johnson County area, said she was finally given the opportunity to meet with prospective students and their families to answer any further questions they had about K-State.

In addition to learning about the academic programs at K-State, a question of where to live may have also been answered for prospective students. Displays were set up by both residence halls and greek housing to present information on housing at K-State.

"Residence halls are being kept open throughout (Saturday) afternoon in an effort to get (students) with parents to actually tour the halls," said Patty Stoneking, junior in psychology and residence hall representative.

Saturday's activities left at least one person impressed with the University and the students. Christianne Chartrand, Leawood, who was visiting her daughter Nancy, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, said she was really glad to see the spirit and enthusiasm generated by K-State students through their tables and displays at Open House.

"It is really nice to see so many students putting so much effort and hard work into something they truly believe in," Chartrand said. "I think it is their pride and spirit for K-State that brings in other students and keeps the school going."

Compact's clauses may halt passage of 'crucial' bills

By ERIN EICHER
News Editor

Even if Kansas legislators pass a law prohibiting underground disposal of low-level radioactive waste in the state, the terms of the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact might declare it "null and void."

The federally mandated compact Kansas agreed to in February 1985 states in part that no member state "shall pass or enforce any law or regulation which is inconsistent with this compact."

"All laws and regulations or parts thereof of any party state which are inconsistent with this compact are hereby declared null and void for the purposes of this compact," the agreement states.

Lt. Gov. Jack Walker last week said state legislators are considering two "crucial" bills, one to prohibit burial of low-level radioactive waste material in Kansas and one to withdraw Kansas from the five-state compact.

Walker also said if Kansas did approve the bill prohibiting burial of low-level radioactive waste, the compact would be forced to comply with state law if Kansas was chosen for the site of a regional facility.

"The compact is written specifically to give leeway to the member states in determining what kind of facility they want in their state," said Ray Peery, executive director of the Central States Compact based in Atlanta, Ga.

"It depends on if the other members of the compact interpret (pending legislation) as a malicious attempt on the part of Kansas to withdraw from the compact," he said.

Craig Swartzendruber, representative of three state power companies, testified in February before the Kansas House of Representatives that passage of a law forbidding underground disposal sites in the state may result in Kansas' membership being revoked.

"Prohibiting below-ground low-level radioactive waste burial or disposal in Kansas could result in the other four states considering Kansas to have passed regulations which are inconsistent and in conflict with the compact," he said.

"Under this situation, Kansas may have its membership revoked."

Department head says burial worry a 'non-problem'

By ERIN EICHER
News Editor

Legislators concerned with low-level radioactive waste disposal are wasting time on a "non-problem," said N. Dean Eckhoff, head of the Department of Nuclear Engineering.

Low-level nuclear waste disposal is a "political quagmire, not a technological problem. There's nothing in this area that we don't have the solutions in hand for," Eckhoff said.

"The regulations get really, really silly. But that's what we get into because we've got so much fat it seems like," he said. "You know we don't have so many desperate problems to worry about so we have to make up problems. That's what I mean by fat...We go about in our BMWs looking for problems to solve."

Eckhoff said disposal of low-level radioactive waste can be handled safely with common sense, however, some regulation is necessary because good judgment can be lacking in companies seeking a profit "because it costs them money to do it, and so they just dump it."

"You get out of this common sense mode and you get into dollar mode, and sometimes you do let dollars direct your common sense," he said.

"You do have some serious problems, and there ought to be some serious concerns," but they can go overboard, he said.

For example, many states have banned shallow-land burial, the method currently used to dispose of K-State's waste materials.

"Some states make their regulations so tight that you couldn't even bury a corpse.

"It's one of those things, if it works, don't fix it. (Shallow-land burial) has been working for a good while," Eckhoff said.

"Now if it will placate some people's minds and make them feel more comfortable, then we say, 'Well, perhaps it ought to be in a concrete bunker if that will soothe somebody's mind,'" he said.

Above-ground disposal facilities are considered easier to monitor than those underground, although they are more susceptible to weather conditions, especially tornadoes.

"Still, if you look at what's there, even if a tornado would come and move it about the countryside and so forth, there's still almost zero risk associated with it," Eckhoff said.

For AIDS patient, life is battle he must fight day by day

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Tom has a new outlook on life: he takes time to develop meaningful relationships, admires the beauty of natural surroundings and doesn't waste time worrying or feeling guilty about unaccomplished work.

Tom was diagnosed with AIDS-Related Complex two years ago.

"It used to be that I would get upset if I didn't accomplish anything," he said. "Now if I don't, I don't have that guilt feeling; just getting up and breathing is enough for me."

People with ARC have been infected with the AIDS virus and experience deterioration of the immune system, making them more susceptible to infection and illness. Yet, they differ from people with AIDS because they have not developed any opportunistic infections usually associated with the disease. An opportunistic infection is one that does not affect a healthy person but usually becomes fatal in people with AIDS.

Tom (not his real name) is not a K-State student but lives in a nearby city. Suffering ailments common to people with ARC, Tom tires easily and sleeps about 12 hours a day. He also has trouble maintaining his weight and often develops fevers.

See related stories, Page 5

He is infected with thrush, a mucous clogging in the lungs, mouth and passage tissue, and most recently developed an itchy rash on his hands and arms that, he says, "drives me crazy."

Tom was admitted to a hospital in 1983 with hepatitis, and although he was not tested for AIDS, he said his current doctor believes he had the virus at that time.

Every year since 1983, he has become increasingly tired.

"A year ago I could drive to San Antonio, Texas," he said. "I wouldn't want to try it now." Driving to Kansas City is too exhausting for him this year, he said.

Aside from his everyday aches and pains, emotional stress is a major problem for Tom.

"Every day is something new; there's a little pain and you worry about it," he said. "I try not to dwell on it; I try not to panic."

When Tom first learned he had contracted ARC, he didn't allow himself to think about its implications.

"It wasn't that I denied the virus," he said. "I just kept myself so occupied that I didn't give myself the opportunity to dwell on it."

Fortunately, when he did feel up to discussing his ailment, Tom had friends to turn to.

"I had a lot of support, a lot of people I could talk to about it," he said. "I was very lucky."

He is now a member of an AIDS and ARC support group in Topeka, where he can go to discuss common problems with peers.

Like the majority of people who contract AIDS-related viruses, Tom is a homosexual. His parents already knew about his sexual preference when he told them he had ARC. He

Aquino endorses unarmed groups

DAVAO CITY, Philippines — President Corazon Aquino endorsed unarmed anti-communist citizens groups Sunday as a legitimate example of "people power" and blamed leftist and rightist extremists for national instability.

The role of such groups has stirred national debate. Supporters believe the groups can contribute to combating communism. Critics fear they will become a threat to law and order.

The military meanwhile remained on full alert against rebel attacks as the Communist New People's Army commemorated the 18th anniversary of its founding. The military said the rebels threatened to kill a general to mark the date, but there were no reports of attacks.

Aquino flew to Davao and Zamboanga on southern Mindanao Island on Sunday to support 24 Senate candidates in the May 11 congressional elections.

She drew only modest crowds, far smaller than those which turned out during rallies in support of the constitution, which was ratified Feb. 2.

Aquino told about 30,000 people in Zamboanga City that "I blame the leftists and the rightists for the present problems in the country."

In Davao City, she told about 5,000 people she was pleased that local officials "saw 'people's power' to take care of the citizens without the use of arms."

Greece gains Aegean Sea oil rights

ATHENS, Greece — Greeks rallied around the government Sunday and labor unions canceled strikes as a standoff with Turkey over Aegean Sea oil rights ended in what Greece saw as a victory for Prime Minister Andreas Papandreou.

A 48-hour military alert was wound down Sunday, but officers could not leave their units, said military sources, speaking on condition of anonymity.

Greece planned a show of military strength with a five-day, air-sea exercise starting Monday in the northeastern Aegean, where a Turkish research ship had planned oil exploration in a continental shelf area claimed by Greece.

Turkey stepped back from a military confrontation with fellow NATO member Greece over mineral rights in the Aegean when it changed the ship's course at the last minute Friday.

'Sound of Music' baroness dies

STOWE, Vt. — The family of Maria von Trapp, whose marriage to a baron and their escape from the Nazis with their children inspired "The Sound of Music," gathered Sunday after her death at the age of 82.

A spokeswoman at the Trapp Family Lodge, a popular resort started by the family in 1962, said the family had received numerous calls of condolence since her death Saturday at the Copley Hospital in Morrisville.

She had been hospitalized Wednesday with intestinal, heart and diabetic problems, said Johannes von Trapp, one of her 10 children and stepchildren.

Maria von Trapp was described variously as a woman of great humility who made a special effort to spend time with workers at her family's resort, a strong, devout Catholic and a woman who was gracious but didn't suffer fools gladly.

Maria von Trapp, a native of Austria, was preparing to be a nun when she was hired as a governess to the widower Baron Georg von Trapp's seven children. She and von Trapp later married and had three more children of their own.

Group holds flashlight prayer vigil

LITTLE ROCK — There were lots of little lights shining Saturday night outside the Governor's Mansion, where about 200 Cleveland County residents gathered for a prayer vigil.

The two-hour flashlight vigil was organized by a group called Arkansans Against Nuclear Dumping, opposed to possible location in southern Arkansas of a low-level radioactive-waste disposal site.

"We are here to remind the governor that he has got to put first things first," Mike Crane of the Cleveland County community of Rowell told the assembly outside the closed gate of the mansion.

In an interview later, Crane said the group wants Clinton to get Arkansas out of the five-state Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact. Other members of the compact are Louisiana, Oklahoma, Kansas and Nebraska.

Studies by the compact have identified two possible sites in southern Arkansas for a disposal site, one of them near Rowell and the other in nearby Dallas County. Members of the group carried signs saying "Will It Be Rowell?", "Dump the Compact," and "No Radiation Without Representation."

The protesters also sang hymns and offered prayers.

Clinton press secretary Mike Gauldin said there would be no comment on the vigil from Clinton, who did not appear during the event.

Bus passengers robbed, stranded

BURLINGTON, Colo. — Bus passengers robbed of cash and jewelry in a holdup reminiscent of stagecoach robberies in the old West remained stranded by snowy roads in Colorado Sunday along with their third bus, which replaced two others that broke down on the Kansas City-to-Denver trip.

"Sounds a little bit like the Wild West woolly days," Ellsworth County Sheriff Raymond Thomas said. "At least we don't need to put wanted posters on trees. We've got computers now."

The sheriff's office reported Sunday that it had no suspects in connection with the Friday robbery. Five passengers on the Trailways bus were robbed of about $1,000 in cash and jewelry.

The bus left Kansas City for the 600-mile trip to Denver at 9:30 p.m. Thursday, but had to stop about two hours later in Wamego when the headlights went out after an electrical short, said Dave Owsley, Kansas City district manager for Trailways.

Four KU students killed by train

LAWRENCE — Police are no closer to determining the cause of a car-train collision that killed four University of Kansas students, a Kansas Highway Patrolman investigating the accident said Sunday.

Trooper J.D. Hall said witnesses to Friday's accident near Lawrence have given conflicting reports about whether the driver of the car was trying to out-run the train.

"We probably never will know whether he tried to outrun the train or just didn't see it," Hall said.

The victims were identified as Daniel J. McDevitt, 19, Salina; Joel D. Grantham, 20, Overland Park; Jennifer L. Jones, 19, Manchester, Mo.; and Elizabeth "Betsy" Dunlap, 21, Salina.

The four were dead on arrival at a hospital, investigators said.

The car, travelling to a Chi Omega barn party, turned off U.S. 24 onto a county road and into the path of a Union Pacific freight train, the patrol said. The impact threw the car into a second train parked on another set of tracks, officials said.

John Bromley, a spokesman for Union Pacific, said the train was traveling 65 mph at the time of the accident. He said Union Pacific would conduct its own investigation.

Both Bromley and Hall said their investigation showed no reason to believe that the engineer or the railroad were at fault.

Hall said blood-alcohol tests have not been completed on the victims, nor has he determined who was driving the car.

Kansas pageant next for student

By JODI SWENGEL
Collegian Reporter

Stephanie Hoop, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, was crowned Miss Manhattan/K-State Saturday night at the 31st annual pageant.

Hoop will now have the opportunity to compete for the title of Miss Kansas in the Miss Kansas Pageant this summer in Pratt. The winner will represent Kansas in the Miss America Pageant in Atlanta.

Along with the crown, Hoop will also receive a $1,000 scholarship.

"I am excited to represent my university and the Manhattan community," Hoop said, adding that the support from the audience at the pageant was wonderful.

The 12 contestants were judged in three categories: talent, interviewing and poise, and appearance.

Hoop sang a jazz rendition of "Over the Rainbow" during the talent portion of the competition. First runner-up and winner of a $400 scholarship was Susan Sommers, junior in apparel design. Sommers performed a piano ragtime medley featuring "Maple Leaf Rag" and "Gladiolus Rag" by Scott Joplin for the talent competition.

Shannon Teufel, sophomore in elementary education, was third runner-up and winner of a $150 scholarship. Teufel performed a baton-twirling routine to "Hooked on Classics" for her talent selection. Dawn Fountain, sophomore in music education, won a $100 scholarship as fourth runner-up and performed a vocal solo during the talent competition.

A congeniality award was given to Michelle Alexander, senior in music. Hoop was also awarded for best interview.

This year's theme was "Lookin' Back" and featured opening and closing numbers by several members of the Manhattan High Pops Choir, under the direction of Dan Commerford. The Blue Notes, the Manhattan High School jazz band directed by Rod Manges, were featured in several selections and provided background music.

The pageant, which drew a capacity crowd at the Manhattan High School Auditorium, was sponsored by the Manhattan Jaycees and the Miss Manhattan/K-State Pageant board. The pageant board organized the official Miss America preliminary pageant.

The reigning Miss Manhattan/K-State, Kerry Tarrant, freshman in general arts and sciences, presented the crown to Hoop. Also attending was the current Miss Kansas, Heather Clark, a graduate of The Wichita State University.

Nancy O'Kane, director of the pageant, said she was pleased with the overall outcome of the pagent and the contestants.

"The talent was extremely strong," O'Kane said. She also said the audience responded well to the production numbers and the general community response was great.

Stephan stresses world peace

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Attorney General Robert Stephan stressed the importance of world peace and his role in furthering this cause during his speech at the All-University Open House.

Stephan was one of about 1,000 people from 80 different countries who participated in a conference in Moscow to discuss the possibility of world peace. He related his experiences Saturday morning in the Union Catskeller.

"I don't want to live there; I don't want any part of it," Stephan said. "And before I left that conference, I learned that all is not love. But there has to be some kind of co-existence to exist.

"It's important to have dialogue, whether you agree or disagree with those on the other side of the fence."

The discussion groups Stephan participated in focused on ways to reach world peace. However, he said, other group members refused to talk about human rights in any detail whenever he made the effort to discuss the topic.

He said the peace forum was a "public relations" effort by the Soviet Union and an ongoing effort to increase chances for change.

"How can we expect to be successful in planning for world peace when human rights in various countries are being violated?" Stephan said. Imprisoning people for their thought process or speech, or even those who wish to emigrate, "makes it hard for the world to come together in a motion of peace," he said.

Stephan said he has an interest in the immigration problems of Jews from the Soviet Union. During his stay, Stephan met with a Jewish family and discussed problems such as a father losing his job after applying for emigration and his son being imprisoned for refusing the draft.

A socialist dictatorship with little regard for human rights still exists under the leadership of Mikhail Gorbachev, but Jewish dissidents may soon have a better chance of leaving the country, Stephan said.

Gorbachev wants less restraint on human rights, Stephan said, and this will give Jews a chance to leave the Soviet Union. He said the United States needs to take advantage of this attitude while it exists.

After meeting Gorbachev, Stephan said the Soviet leader knew how to "work a crowd" and was a "spellbinder." He said Gorbachev was also clever and a good politician.

While in Moscow, Stephan said he attended several social events including the ballet theater, a circus with Mongolian performers and a night of folk dancing. He said he also saw the first privately owned restaurant operated for profit.

Stephan's speech was sponsored by the Department of Political Science.

Provost candidate advocates excellence

Morton Glick

By BECKY HOWARD
Staff Writer

Milton Glick, dean of arts and sciences at the University of Missouri at Columbia and provost candidate, stressed striving for excellence in all areas of the University at a forum Friday in the Union.

Cornelia Flora, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work and chairwoman of the provost search committee, said Glick was concerned with excellence in all areas of the University and the importance of the role of provost.

"Something unique he talked about was the concern to have a better link with grades K through 12 in education to improve the quality of education later on," she said.

In addition, Glick, the last of the three candidates to be interviewed, discussed the importance of a strong arts and sciences program and what criteria should be used to judge whether programs in these areas should be eliminated.

"Glick mentioned that a program being considered for elimination should undergo two questions," Flora said. "One question is, 'Does a university actually save money by cutting a program?,' and the other question is, 'Is the program really a bad program?'"

Wayne Nafziger, professor of economics, said Glick emphasized that this procedure should be used especially in the cutting of graduate degree programs, because undergraduate and graduate programs complement each other.

"He said that unless a program is not a good one, it shouldn't be cut, and in most cases, cutting graduate degree programs doesn't save money," Nafziger said.

"I was very impressed with Glick, in that he was very articulate and seemed very acquainted with higher educational issues regionally as well as nationally," he said.

Sandra Coyner, director of women's studies, said Glick seemed very supportive of affirmative action issues in a university environment.

"I was encouraged that he knew so much about affirmative action. He seemed to have done his homework in this area, so I think he's probably done his homework in other areas as well," Coyner said.

Provost Owen Koeppe will step down June 30 after seven years of service.

Truths of killer AIDS rise to fore this week

Today marks the beginning of AIDS Awareness Week at K-State and the time should be used to emphasize the truths about the killer disease, as well as the untruths. Although there is evidence that the heterosexual community no longer views the disease as just a homosexual one and is beginning to think about what the disease's impact will be, that isn't enough.

It's time for the heterosexual community to act on that knowledge.

While most of the attention has been justifiably focused on the medical aspects of the disease, there has been little discussion of the economic and social consequences, which will be monumental.

With any luck, activities like AIDS Awareness Week will initiate such discussions, which in turn will initiate solutions.

International Week is helpful for all students

K-State has a rare opportunity this week. Students, faculty and staff have a chance to take part in the International Week activities taking place over the next six days in the Union.

The celebration is intended to make more people aware of the foreign students that attend K-State, provide chances to learn about their cultures and realize some of the benefits these students bring to this institution.

Throughout the week, movies, exhibits and other performances will be presented to provide spectators with examples of music, theater and cuisine from various countries.

K-State, with 867 foreign students representing 92 countries, has one of the largest enrollments of foreign students in the Midwest. The University should be proud of the fact its programs can draw such a large number of students from around the world.

It is not easy for some of these students to attend school in the United States, just as it is difficult for American students to endure the expense and related difficulties of attending foreign colleges. American citizens should be respectful of international students' desires to want to be educated in an institution such as ours.

Let's take the opportunity this week to learn more about our neighboring cultures and show our support for international students at K-State.

Israeli-PLO statement signals hope for peace

Last week, on the eighth anniversary of the Israeli-Egyptian peace treaty, another important step was taken toward achieving peace in the Middle East.

Israeli legislators from Defense Minister Shimon Peres' Labor Party and Palestinian leaders supportive of Yassar Arafat's Palestine Liberation Organization signed a joint appeal asking for negotiations "between recognized and legitimate representatives of Israel, Jordan and the Palestinian people."

The six-paragraph statement was important not only in what it stated but also because of who signed it. Abba Eban, chairman of Parliament's Foreign Affairs and Defense Committee and one of the statement's signers, said, "It is the first time that Israeli and Palestinian leaders have signed anything together."

Furthermore, Hanna Siniora, editor of the pro-PLO daily newspaper Al Fajr and also one of the statement's signers, noted that this marked the first time Israeli officials had indirectly accepted the PLO as a dialogue partner. One major obstacle to bringing peace to the Middle East has been Israel's refusal to acknowledge the PLO as the sole, legitimate representative of the Palestinian people.

In fact, Siniora had been selected in 1985 to represent the Palestinians in a joint Palestinian-Jordanian delegation that was to discuss with the United States the possibility of renewing a peace effort. Those meetings, however, have been continually thwarted by Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir.

It is hoped that the agreement signed last week signals a new direction in Israeli policies, which have often been more of an obstacle than an aid to achieving an Arab-Israeli peace agreement.

Welcome to paradise

Of bars, St. Thomas, more bars

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

Sunday, March 15, 12:05 p.m. We are now flying along at 24,000 feet above the Missouri countryside toward St. Louis, the first leg of our spring break odyssey. With luck we will reach our final destination at 7:30 tomorrow morning — a long journey to reach the paradise of St. Thomas, United States Virgin Islands. My fellow travelers, known here only as BC, Pyro and C2, are jamming to Rush and Led Zeppelin on their walkman radios while I record our exploits on my tape machine. We all snap back to reality as we see the flight attendant coming down the aisle with drinks. I'll be back later....

3 p.m. — After two hours and six airport cocktails, we are back in the air and heading for our next stop in Miami. This flight has better service, as we have already gotten our first round of drinks. Alcohol does funny things at high altitudes. C2 is striking up a deal to sell his car to the used car salesman sitting beside him. I turn around and tell him to hand over the keys and get cash from the guy. We might need the money to pay for these $3-a-shot airplane drinks.

7:15 p.m. — Lost an hour crossing time zones. We have now moved to the back of the plane to be closer to the bar. We've managed to whip up a pretty good party back here. This guy from New York has a jam box and the flight attendant is keeping a running tab on our drinks.

We didn't have time to get off the plane in Miami, so we amused ourselves by watching the activities on the tarmac outside. A baggage cart came roaring around the corner so fast that three suitcases and a golf bag flew out. I began to worry about my own suitcase, which prompted our move to the back of the plane. Five rum and Cokes erased any fears about such inconsequential matters. The next stop is San Juan, Puerto Rico, where we have a 10-hour layover before catching a half-hour flight to St. Thomas in the morning.

9:30 p.m. — We have landed safely in San Juan. Except for Pyro's brief moment of paranoia when he tried to open the window with his fingernails, the flight was pleasant. A couple of shots of rum at the airport bar managed to calm his fears. We are stowing our bags so that we can explore the city. I'll just have to wing it the next few hours.

3 a.m. Monday — Downtown didn't look very far away so we started walking. The more we walked, the more we realized that alcohol in massive quantities can play tricks on a person's depth perception. After 45 minutes, we finally reached downtown.

Our first mission was to find a beach. We had been traveling for about 15 hours and hadn't even touched a beach yet. We walked in circles for about half an hour before we found it. The ocean looked great with no moon and the rain coming down. We took shelter at a little bar there on the beach. After a few drinks we knew we were going to have to brave the weather in order to find night-life excitement. One last shot of rum to warm us up and we again staggered into the streets of San Juan.

These neighborhoods at night are not the most comforting places in the world. We were lost, wet and drunk in a strange world with Spanish street signs. I don't know if San Juan has a crime problem, but that would help explain why there are bars on all the windows and steel gates across every driveway. It was my turn for paranoia. Must find another bar.

We found the beach again and followed it to a place called the San Juan Hotel and Casino. Even in the dark rain, the beauty of the grounds fascinated me. As we walked past the swimming pool and waterfall and into the lobby, the luxury of this place astounded me. Huge chandeliers hung from the hand-finished woodwork that made up the ceiling. The whole place was a work of art that would put many places in Las Vegas to shame. All we had to do now was to find the bar and casino, in that order.

Looking like drowned rats, it was a wonder we didn't get thrown out. But everyone was welcome, as long as they left their money in the casino. Even with Pyro trying to pick up the cigarette girl and BC stealing the wine list, we were able to walk out peacefully with about $30 in slot machine winnings.

After failing to get food from Burger King, we called a cab from the bar in Pizza Hut (yes, a bar)! We rode back to the airport with a colorblind cab driver, which was obvious due to his failure to recognize stoplights. Back at the airport we were faced with a more startling revelation; this restaurant was also closed. Even the bar was vacant and dark. The only place open was the ice cream shop. All was not lost, for the shop also sold beer. This would have to do us until our plane leaves at 7.

8 a.m. — Alas! My feet are on the ground in paradise. If this is what it takes to get here, maybe we should stay awhile. I'm not sure a week is long enough to recover for the return trip.

The flight was anything but uneventful. Our plane was an Aero Virgin Islands DC-3, a plane that used to carry paratroopers in World War II. Pyro and I had seats right next to the cockpit with a good view of the ancient control panel. Then there was a commotion in the rear of the plane. BC was yelling at the stewardess and co-pilot as they tried to throw him off the plane. It seems they had overbooked the flight and there was no place left for BC. He got in one last blow with his suitcase before being ejected. I just looked straight ahead, feeling like I was escaping some prison camp. I got my seat belt on. They'll never take me alive!

It was really interesting to see the pilots fly this ancient hulk. They left the cockpit door open through much of the flight, or at least until the trouble started. It seems a hydraulic gage blew up and started spraying the crew with hydraulic oil. The pilot yelled in Spanish for the co-pilot to close the cockpit door. After slipping four times on the slick fluid, the co-pilot, covered head to foot in hydraulic oil, managed to kick the door shut. The person behind me informed us that he was an airplane mechanic for a cargo company in St. Thomas, and this situation was not serious. He then proceeded to tell me about other close calls he had with DC-3s. Pyro and C2 were clamoring about the plane looking for parachutes. BC may have gotten the good end of the deal.

Wes, the friend who we went through all of this to see, met us at the airport bar where we were trying to wind down from our flight. He came hobbling over on crutches, his foot in a cast. At least he's off work for our visit. He proceeded to tell us the bad news about getting kicked out of his apartment and us having to find another place to stay. We all had a few more drinks as we waited for BC to arrive on the next flight. Welcome to Paradise.

Defining priorities

Editor,

My only comment in response to the article, "University athletes enroll before others" in Friday's Collegian, is that I am glad, once and for all, to see just where the priorities of Kansas State University lie.

DiAnn Roberts
junior in business education

K-Sports University

Editor,

Re: the article "University athletes enroll before others" in Friday's Collegian. When will it end? We get hit again with another example of the tail wagging the dog.

What do I mean? The first question is the purpose for the existence of K-State. If it is to give students an education, then now is the time for the president to take a stand and show it. But if, as the actions and events of the past show, it is to provide entertainment for alumni and a home for aspiring pro athletes, we're on the right track.

Just remember: One, we can't fund a library, but we can build a new arena. Why not a Fred Bramlage Library? Two, even after campaigning in the polling place itself, the athletic fee was defeated. Coaches and their pawns, saying we lost because of a clause, keep up the pressure to force Student Senate to run it through. Is the First Amendment also just a clause?

And now we have evidence that these athletes are not on the level of mere students. They can now enroll before anyone else, even if they have not yet been admitted!

So now, students are to be punished for wanting to study instead of play games, and so they will miss out on classes for students who aren't even admitted to K-State.

What are we here for? Maybe we should rename it Kansas Sports University and let everyone know why we're here and for what we stand.

AIDS remains immune to medical advances

Editor's Note: This is the first in a daily five-part series dealing with AIDS. On Tuesday, the University's AIDS policy and Manhattan public school AIDS education will be examined.

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Nationally, 1.5 million people have tested positive to human immunodeficiency virus antibody yet only about 33,000 have developed AIDS, according to the Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta.

Anyone who has the AIDS virus antibody is a carrier and can transmit the disease. Presence of the antibody in the system shows that the virus is living in the body, but thus far the antibody has been able to ward off the virus, protecting the person from related physical ailments.

Two forms of HIV less severe than AIDS also occur in people who test positive to the antibody. A person who develops a form of HIV in his immune system no longer produces an adequate amount of antibodies to stave off the virus.

The reality of AIDS

About 20-30 percent of those who test HIV-positive develop one or more of the three illnesses, said William Wade, a Topeka specialist on sexually transmitted diseases who handles the majority of AIDS cases in the Topeka area.

Of the three, the least severe ailment is persistent generalized lymphadenopathy, or persistently swollen lymph nodes. The AIDS-Related Complex is more serious and entails damage to the immune system, which opens the body to infections and viruses. AIDS occurs when a person develops an opportunistic infection — one that does not affect healthy individuals but usually becomes fatal in AIDS patients.

About 10 percent of people with AIDS do not develop an opportunistic infection.

"Some people with AIDS don't present with opportunistic infections but present with subtle mental changes and dementia due to infection in the brain with HIV," Wade said.

While people with PGL and ARC may never develop AIDS, the greater the damage to their systems, the greater their chances are of developing AIDS, Wade said.

Wade said because the virus has only been studied for about six years, there is not a broad statistical base to determine projections from.

"That's difficult to say, but probably many (people with ARC will get AIDS)," he said.

However, Charles Wood, assistant professor of microbiology at the University of Kansas currently doing research on AIDS, said he believes most people with ARC will develop AIDS.

"Eventually most of the ARC patients become AIDS patients," he said.

Within the next five years, the number of AIDS cases is projected to increase from 33,000 to 270,000, according to CDC. Nine percent of those cases are expected to be of heterosexuals.

While there is no cure for illnesses inflicted by HIV, AZT is the only drug approved by the Food and Drug Administration for AIDS and ARC, and has been helpful in slowing down the reproduction of the AIDS virus in some patients. It was released about two weeks ago from its experimental stage by its manufacturer, Burroughs-Wellcome Co.

AZT was used experimentally on AIDS patients with Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia, the most common life-threatening opportunistic infection, Wade said. It will now be opened up to more poeple with the infection and to ARC patients "who have a significantly depleted T-4 count," he said.

T-4 is one of the essential cells of the immune system and the one that is usually attacked by the virus, he said.

Kathy Bartlett, company spokesperson for Burroughs-Wellcome, said the drug will only be available to people with those ailments because it is in overdemand and "FDA-approved uses for the drug...clearly outweigh the risks," in these cases, she said.

The drug does have negative aspects, including one that can kill a person with AIDS, Wade said. A side effect some AZT-users get is bone marrow suppression that decreases the body's ability to make new blood cells. If the patient is not taken off AZT soon enough he can die from it, Wade said.

Other side effects common to AZT users are nausea, vomiting, fatigue, high fevers, headaches and anemia. Over time, a patient's body may adapt to the drug and lose some of the less severe effects, he said.

Wade said people who are not given AZT won't necessarily be better off than those that are.

"If they do get AZT, it may prolong their lives; if they don't, they still may not die," he said.

The yearly cost of AZT will be from $6,000-$10,000, depending on the dosage, Bartlett said.

The exorbitant price of the drug is due to the cost of research that now must be absorbed, said Dr. Robert Tout, director of Lafene Student Health Center.

An official at the U.S. Public Health Service said 26 states will at least partially pay for AZT. Kansas is not one of these.

Bob Moody, public information officer for the Kansas Department of Health and Environment, said no money has been allocated for the use of AZT.

"There are no funds available at this time for AZT purchase," he said. Gov. Mike Hayden is setting up an AIDS task force to be announced within the next two weeks, Moody said, and task force members may address this issue.

Tout said Kansas pays for medications for other sexually transmitted diseases.

Wade said once a person tests positive for the HIV antibody he may never get AIDS, but the possibility will be with the person for the rest of his or her life.

Most of Wade's patients suffer more anxiety when they find out they test antibody positive than they do when they find out they have AIDS because it's a relief to find out "one way or the other."

Wade is against mandatory testing but said people at high risk — homosexuals, bisexual, promiscuous heterosexuals and intraveneous drug abusers — should voluntarily be tested.

"I don't feel like knowing the truth is nearly as anxiety-producing as [illegible] the truth," he said.

Breakdown of AIDS cases

Nationally, about 33,000 people have AIDS, and 58 percent of these have died. A positive response for the HIV antibody was shown in 1.5 million people tested. By the end of 1991, CDC has projected there will be 270,000 cases of AIDS, and of those, 66 percent will die.

ADULT CASES (with a 0.5 percent margin of error)

— 66 percent: gay or bisexual men
— 17 percent: intravenous drug abuses
— 8 percent: homosexual or bisexual intravenous drug abuses
— 4 percent: from heterosexual contact
— 3 percent: undetermined
— 2 percent: from blood transfusions
— 1 percent: hemophiliacs

Males represent 93 percent of the cases, while 7 percent are females.

CHILDREN, 13 AND UNDER (About 1 percent of all cases)

— 80 percent: received from mother at birth
— 12 percent: blood transfusions
— 5 percent: hemophiliacs
— 3 percent: undetermined

In Kansas, 59 cases of AIDS have been reported, according to the Kansas Department of Health and Environment. Of these, 34 people, or 58 percent, have died.

— 80 percent: homosexual or bisexual males
— 7 percent: blood transfusion
— 5 percent: undetermined
— 3 percent: hemophiliac or coagulant disorders
— 3 percent: heterosexual
— 2 percent: transmitted at birth

None were reported to be intravenous drug abusers.

AIDS education goal of activities

By DORI WITHERS

The Gay and Lesbian Resource Center is sponsoring "AIDS Awareness Week" this week to increase people's awareness of the virus and how to avoid contracting it.

"The whole thing about AIDS is it's important to get the information out," said Patrick Orth, junior in interior architecture and co-president of GLRC. "Once you get AIDS, it's a death sentence."

Acquired immune deficiency syndrome is a virus that damages the body's natural immune defenses against disease. People who have AIDS develop unusual, life-threatening illnesses that do not affect people with normal immune systems. Two of the illneses often seen in AIDS patients are Pneumocytsis carinii pnuemonia and Kaposi's sarcoma (a rare type of cancer).

AIDS can be transmitted by some types of sexual contact and by intraveneous drug use. AIDS may also be passed from a mother to her unborn child.

A positive antibody test does not necessarily mean the individual will get AIDS, but it does mean the person could infect others with the AIDS virus.

"AIDS Awareness Week" will begin with the film "Sex, Drugs and AIDS" at 7:30 p.m. in Union 209. William Wade, Topeka specialist on sexually transmitted diseases who handles the majority of AIDS cases in the area, will speak at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in the Union Big Eight Room on the medical aspects of AIDS. The topic of safer sex will be covered by Eric Schuman, a physician's assistant who works with the Topeka AIDS Project, at 7:30 p.m. Wednesday in Denison 113A. The week will wrap up with the psychological aspects of AIDS with Jeff Martin, a psychologist from New York, speaking at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in Denison 113A.

Conditions test spirit of students

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Agriculture Editor

Through rain, wind, sleet and cold, the show went on. The Little American Royal took place Saturday afternoon with a few minor adjustments and a lot of cooperation.

Because of inclement weather and Weber Hall renovation, one-third of Weber Hall arena had to be partitioned off to house the beef and dairy animals. Normally, the beef and dairy cattle would be tied outside the arena.

"I think everything will work out OK," said David Nichols, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry and LAR faculty adviser. "Everyone is cooperating and trying to keep a positive outlook of the situation."

'I wonder sometimes why I go through all of this; then I realize I enjoy the experience, working with an animal and meeting and talking with so many people.'

— Kim Buethe

Usually there are five show rings for the LAR. This had to be cut back to four in order to give the beef and dairy cattle showmen room inside for their animals, Nichols said.

About 700 people braved the rain and cold temperatures to attend the show.

"We had a better turnout than expected," Nichols said. "This is also one of the largest attendances we have had."

About 150 students participated in the show, which was fewer than previous years due mainly to the weather conditions of the past week.

"We had a large number drop out the last two days because of the bad weather," said Garth Gardiner, sophomore in animal sciences and industry and beef species chairman.

Laura Webster, sophomore in dietetics, keeps an eye on the judge while showing her horse.

Participants kept their chins high realizing there was nothing they could do about the weather.

"I wonder sometimes why I go through all of this; then I realize I enjoy the experience, working with an animal and meeting and talking with so many people," said Kim Buethe, junior in animal sciences and industry and LAR beef showman.

"Looking back at it, believe me it is all worth it," she said.

Jon Nikkel, senior in agricultural economics, was the champion beef showman, and Matt Nelsen, freshman in general agriculture, took the reserve champion beef trophy home.

"I had a lot of fun and really enjoyed myself," said Jose Rogers, animal caretaker and first-time dairy showman. "It was a great experience, and I plan on doing it again next year."

The top dairy showman was Liz Altwegg, junior in animal sciences and industry, and reserve champion dairy showman honors went to Dana Huntington, senior in marketing.

This year's horse showmen received a lot of experience because many of the horses used for the show were young and had not previously been worked with in showing-type situations.

Denise Laird, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, was the champion horse showman, and Beverly Meehan, freshman in business, was the reserve champion horse showman.

After waiting for about an hour for a free show ring, the sheep showmen were able to begin their portion of the LAR show.

Champion sheep showman honors went to Oscar West, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, and reserve champion sheep showman honors were won by Bryan Rein, senior in pre-veterinary medicine.

"It was quite an interesting experience showing a pig for the first time," said Sue Phillips, senior in human ecology and swine showman. "I learned a lot and had a lot of fun."

Julie Thompson, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, was this year's champion swine showman, and Darrel Messner, junior in animal sciences and industry, was the reserve champion swine showman.

Each year the Little American Royal sponsors five scholarships based on overall activities, scholarship, LAR activities and financial need.

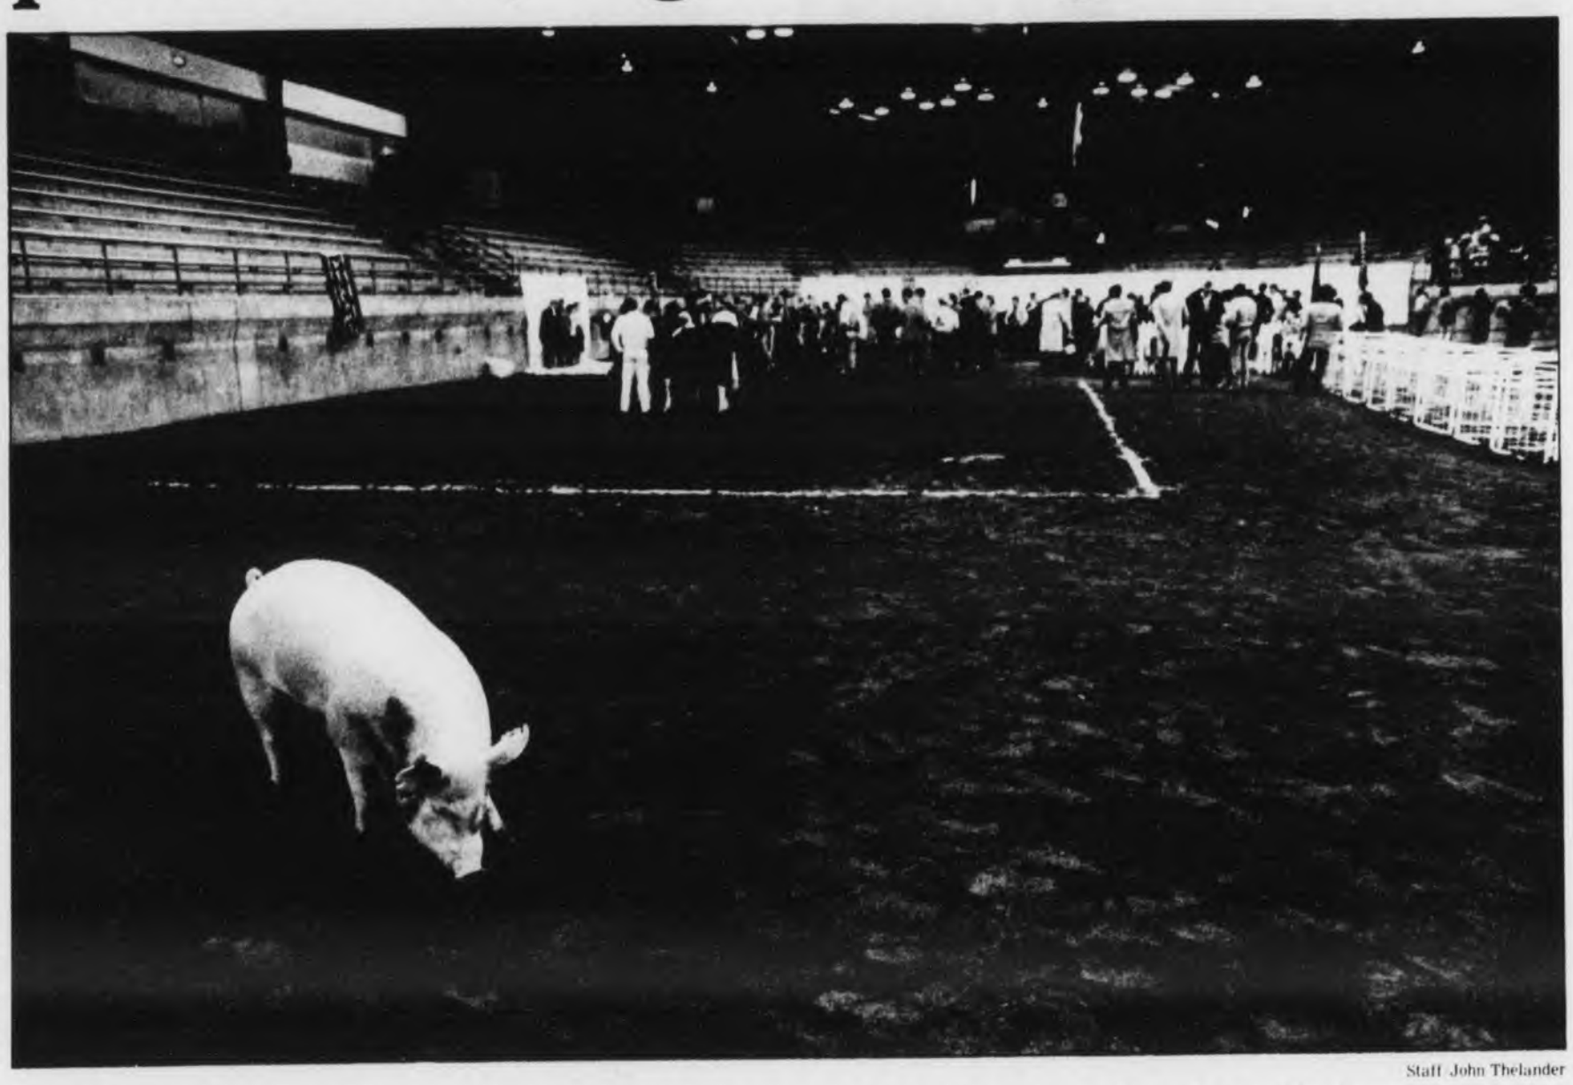
Herdsmanship awards are presented each year to one contestant from each species category who is cooperative with the individual unit herdsmen and other contestants, eager and willing to help other contestants, care for animals and clean up the units.

Herdsmanship recipients are: Scott Anderson, junior in animal sciences and industry and horse species herdsmanship winner; Huntington, dairy species herdsmanship recipient; David Parks, sophomore in general agriculture and swine species herdsmanship winner; Julie Reynolds, senior in animal sciences and industry and beef species herdsmanship recipient; Glenda Shinn, junior in animal sciences and industry and sheep species herdsmanship winner.



A distinguished agricultural leader is honored each year by the Little American Royal. This year's LAR dedicatee was Don Good, animal sciences and industry department head, who joined the K-State faculty in 1947.

Good is recognized throughout Kansas as a dedicated agricultural leader and supporter. Good is also known among students and faculty as a strong agricultural and education supporter and an avid K-Stater.

"I have really enjoyed all that the students in the College of Agriculture have done for me, and I appreciate the time and dedication they put into making this Little American Royal a huge success," Good said.

"I don't know what day we should have this show, but no matter when we have it, it always seems to rain," he said.

Good said the students did a good job under the circumstances, and he would like to congratulate all those who participated in this year's Little American Royal.

Class members organize annual event

Bull auction's success mirrors market

By TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Animal Sciences and Industry sold 42 bulls Saturday in Weber Hall arena at the 10th annual Special "K" Edition Sale.

The livestock sales management class has prepared for the sale since August under the direction of Miles McKee, professor of animal sciences and industry, and Bill Able, associate director of animal sciences and industry.

The 38-student class did everything from designing the sale catalog and advertisements to setting up the sale arena and preparing some of the cattle.

The sale featured bulls from three breeds — Angus, Simmental and Hereford. In the past only one breed has been sold at each Special "K" Edition Sale. McKee believes combining the three breeds in one sale was beneficial.

"What we are aiming for is the commercial market. The commercial man today is going more and more with multi-breed use," he said. McKee cited one buyer who bid on bulls from more than one breed.

The Angus bulls averaged $1,096 with 19 lots. The 12 Simmental bulls averaged $1,144, and 11 Herefords averaged $1,234.

The high-selling bull, bringing $2,600, was a 2-year-old Hereford.

McKee was pleased with the outcome of the sale, citing it as an indication of the improving cattle market.

Students showed about 30 of the bulls in the Little American Royal early Saturday afternoon, giving buyers an opportunity to see the bulls before the sale.

Holding the Little American Royal and the Special "K" Edition Sale on the same day gave people, who otherwise wouldn't be in Manhattan for both events, the opportunity to see both events, McKee said.

It also gave people a chance to see another student-run activity at K-State, he said. About 300 people attended the sale.

Some people living west of Manhattan didn't attend because of snow and closed roads, he said. But McKee was pleased with the turnout.

Because of the weather and other complications, the livestock sales management class dealt with changes in the regular sale format.

One problem facing the students was the renovation of Weber Hall. Last fall the class was not sure if Weber arena would be available, and if it was, they needed to plan how to set up the arena, since some exits and entrances were unavailable because of construction.

This year's sale underwent two major changes that caused changes in the scheduling of the sale. Because the Department of Animal Sciences and Industry held the sale on the day of the Little American Royal and sold more than one breed, the students in the class had to make many changes in the sale format from previous sales.

Syracuse, Hoosiers vie for NCAA title

NEW ORLEANS — Bob Knight and Jim Boeheim have both thrown chairs in anger at basketball games. The difference is in how they threw them.

The coaches — Knight of Indiana and Boeheim of Syracuse — take their teams into the championship game of the NCAA basketball tournament Monday night.

They are a study in contrasting styles, although they have one thing in common: Both have been very successful.

In 22 years of coaching, the last 16 at Indiana, Knight has a record of 467-169, and has won two national titles. While never winning the national championship, Boeheim has a career mark of 261-83 in 11 seasons at Syracuse.

Knight is the tough guy, the basketball genius who spends his off hours fly fishing and reading World War II history. His hero is said to be Gen. George Patton.

Boeheim, on the other hand, is the whiner, the guy who couldn't win the big one, a former golf coach and 8-handicapper.

Knight is in the news nearly as often for his own antics as he is for the accomplishments of his team. He got into trouble with the law in Puerto Rico during the 1979 Pan American Games, then stuffed a Louisiana State fan into a garbage can in a Cherry Hill, N.J., hotel during the 1981 Final Four. Like Knight, Boeheim is emotional on the sidelines during games, but he recognizes that his reputation is not unmarked. "People don't say I'm a good coach," he said earlier in the NCAA tournament. "They don't say I'm a bad coach. They say I'm not bad."

Boeheim has taken the Orangemen into the NCAA tournament nine times, but had never gotten past the second round until this year.

When he threw his chair, it was in the privacy of the press room during the 1983 Big East Conference tournament.

"I tend to think in terms of our program," Boeheim said Sunday at a news conference. "If people respect our program, then I think they'll have some respect for me. I'm not really concerned from the 'me' aspect, though. So much is made by the media of success in the NCAA tournament — and wrongly so, I think. I could have been beaten in the first round, and I guess then I'd still have been a lousy coach."

Knight, too, professes little personal interest in winning another national title, even though he would join Adolph Rupp and John Wooden as the only three-time winners.

"The only significance at this point for me is what it would mean to our players," Knight said.

INTERSESSION AT KSU—Spring

The three weeks between spring semester and summer school are a special time at KSU—the weather is great, parking is easy, the frenzy of graduation is over, and life on campus is extremely pleasant. The spaciousness of the campus is a perfect setting for highly concentrated classes.

Intersession classes usually meet for three hours a day, providing time to focus on a subject in depth. In a survey of Winter Intersession students, 75 percent felt that the most attractive features of Intersession were the chance to concentrate on one course at a time and the opportunity to earn extra credits to accelerate their programs. Both students and faculty have found Intersession to be a rewarding experience.

Spring '87 Intersession offers 45 credit courses—of 1, 2, or 3 credits each—from a wide variety of departments and colleges at KSU. Tuition and registration are explained below. Questions about specific course content or requirements should be addressed directly to instructors. If this publication doesn't answer all your questions, please call the Division of Continuing Education at 532-5566 (toll-free in Kansas, 1-800-432-8222).

See you in class!

REGISTRATION

Intersession is open to KSU students and to the public. Prior enrollment at KSU is not necessary and registration is a simple one-step process.

Intersession registration will take place in the BASEMENT OF FARRELL LIBRARY; registration dates are April 27-29 and the registration staff will be available from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m. those three days. Additional registrations will be accepted from 8:00 a.m. to 6:00 p.m. Monday through Friday at 317 Umberger Hall from April 30 through the first day of class.

Tuition is due at the time of enrollment. (Some lab and materials fees are also due at this time. See schedule.) The decision as to which courses will "go" will be based on the number of registrations recorded by 4:00 p.m. on April 29. The go/drop list will be posted near the Information Desk in the K-State Union on Monday, May 4; go/drop information will also be available from the Continuing Education Registration office (317 Umberger, 532-5566).

Students unable to enroll in person April 27-29 may phone or mail in their registration. These registrations will be processed (in the order in which they are received) ONLY if spaces remain in the class as of 4:00 p.m. on April 27. Students may request a friend to enroll for them to maximize their chances of getting into their first-choice class.

Students are asked to check with their advisers to ensure that the Intersession class will meet degree requirements.

Students must show written evidence of payment of any financial delinquency to the university in order to register for Intersession.

BE PROMPT!!

Although registrations in most "go" classes will be accepted until the first day of class, students are encouraged to register during the April 27-29 registration period at Farrell Library. The "go/drop" decision is based on enrollments collected during that period. Delays in student registration could result in courses being cancelled; students interested in Intersession courses should register April 27-29 to be sure their preferred classes have a good chance of going as scheduled.

LATE ENROLLMENTS

A $10.00 late fee will be charged for enrollments after the second class meeting ends, but before one-third of the class meetings have elapsed. A late fee of $25 will be charged for late enrollments after one-third of the class meetings have elapsed but before two-thirds of the class meetings have elapsed. NO ENROLLMENTS WILL BE ACCEPTED AFTER TWO-THIRDS OF THE CLASS MEETINGS HAVE ELAPSED.

COSTS

Tuition is $42 per undergraduate (UG) credit hour and $60 per graduate (G) credit hour and is due at the time of enrollment; tuition is the same for Kansas residents and for non-residents. Some classes will require lab fees, materials fees, or other costs, and these are indicated in the course listing. The lab and materials fees will be collected at registration. Lab and materials fees collected by Continuing Education are non-refundable after the go/drop decision has been posted (May 4), except for courses which have been cancelled. Travel arrangements, for courses requiring them, must be made with the instructors as early as possible.

CREDIT

The maximum credit allowed is four (4) hours per student. Anyone wishing to enroll in more than four credit hours must have written approval from his or her academic dean at the time of registration. STUDENTS WISHING TO SIGN UP FOR COURSES ON AN A-PASS-FAIL BASIS MUST DO SO AT THE TIME OF REGISTRATION, OR BEFORE ONE-THIRD OF THE CLASS MEETINGS HAVE ELAPSED.

RETAKES

Undergraduate students may retake a course during Intersession in order to improve their grade. Students must indicate "Retake" on the enrollment form when they register for the course.

AUDIT

GRADES

Intersession grades will be averaged into the student's KSU G.P.A. Grades will be mailed to students beginning June 22, 1987.

CANCELLED CLASSES

No individual notification about cancelled classes will be made. The "go/drop" notice will be posted in the K-State Union near the Information Desk on May 4. Students may also phone 532-5566 after that date to inquire. Students who enrolled in a cancelled class may either register for another class or obtain a full refund. Students must report to 317 Umberger Hall to officially DROP or ADD.

DROP/ADD PROCEDURE

To drop or add a course, students must submit a drop/add form (or other written notice) to the Registration Office, Division of Continuing Education, 317 Umberger Hall. Students who fail to attend class may receive an "F" unless they formally drop the course.

REFUNDS

All refund requests must be made in person or in writing to the Division Registrar, 317 Umberger Hall. A 100% refund will be issued if the request is received before the second class begins, or if the class is cancelled. A 50% refund will be issued if received after the second class begins, but before one-third of the classes have ended. NO refunds will be issued after one-third of the class meetings have ended. Lab or materials fees collected at registration are non-refundable except those for cancelled classes.

BOOKS

Textbooks (required or recommended) have been ordered for some classes and will be available at Varney's Bookstore at the start of Intersession. Information about textbooks is available from the instructor or from Varney's. Classes for which textbooks have been ordered are indicated with the letters TB at the end of the course description in this listing.

HOUSING

Overnight housing on campus is available to Intersession students at a very reasonable rate. Rooms in a K-State residence hall are available at $9 per person per night for a double room. Intersession students interested in arranging to stay in the residence hall should contact Phil Schlee, KSU Housing Office, Pittman Building, 913-532-6453, to request room reservation forms. Advance reservation is recommended.

Profs. Bob Burnham, Dale Bryant, and Jim Jones. May 18-June 5, 1987. No class Memorial Day. Monday-Friday from 1-5:30 p.m. Seaton Hall, Room 206.

This course will examine the role of the river and adjacent land in the continuing development of the City of Manhattan, Kansas. The role of the eastern edge of the city has shifted greatly in the last two decades. It was an industrial fringe supporting a group of light industrial uses subject to periodic flooding from the river. The river's edge was largely disengaged from the community by the railroad right of way and this industrial strip. Today, the industrial uses have largely disappeared, but the lack of definition still exists. The river is a magnificent natural resource. It represents a powerful community resource. The primary entrances to the city cross the river. This unclear and unstudied edge of the city has a huge potential impact on the image, quality and economic potential of downtown and the city as a whole. The problem is how to develop it to realize this potential.

Members of the local design community and other interested parties will be organized to consider this problem and produce a plan or a series of plans which might respond to it. The objective of this effort will be to help the community focus on the problem and begin to think about responding to it.

This will examine the structure of economic development planning, how governments and corporations, in particular, create both the context for economic growth and the milieu for innovation. While directed toward the situation in the United States, readings will explore the experiences of other nations whose record of success has been greater. Emphasis will be upon the public policy requirements for planned growth and development. TB

Syracuse, Hoosiers vie for NCAA title

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Bob Knight and Jim Boeheim have both thrown chairs in anger at basketball games. The difference is in how they threw them.

The coaches — Knight of Indiana and Boeheim of Syracuse — take their teams into the championship game of the NCAA basketball tournament Monday night.

They are a study in contrasting styles, although they have one thing in common: Both have been very successful.

In 22 years of coaching, the last 16 at Indiana, Knight has a record of 467-169, and has won two national titles. While never winning the national championship, Boeheim has a career mark of 261-83 in 11 seasons at Syracuse.

Knight is the tough guy, the basketball genius who spends his off hours fly fishing and reading World War II history. His hero is said to be Gen. George Patton.

Boeheim, on the other hand, is the whiner, the guy who couldn't win the big one, a former golf coach and 8-handicapper.

Knight is in the news nearly as often for his own antics as he is for the accomplishments of his team. He got into trouble with the law in Puerto Rico during the 1979 Pan American Games, then stuffed a Louisiana State fan into a garbage can in a Cherry Hill, N.J., hotel during the 1981 Final Four. He threw a chair across the court in 1985, and he began an angry mood beca written about his 1985-he felt contained too much of his profanity.

Like Knight, Boeheim is emotional on the sidelines during games, but he recognizes that his reputation is not unmarked. "People don't say I'm a good coach," he said earlier in the NCAA tournament. "They don't say I'm a bad coach. They say I'm not bad."

Boeheim has taken the Orangemen into the NCAA tournament nine times, but had never gotten past the second round until this year.

When he threw his chair, it was in the privacy of the press room during the 1983 Big East Conference tournament.

"I tend to think in terms of our program," Boeheim said Sunday at a news conference. "If people respect our program, then I think they'll have some respect for me. I'm not really concerned from the 'me' aspect, though. So much is made by the media of success in the NCAA tournament — and wrongly so, I think. I could have been beaten in the first round, and I guess then I'd still have been a lousy coach."

Knight, too, professes little personal interest in winning another national title, even though he would join Adolph Rupp and John Wooden as the only three-time winners.

"The only significance at this point for me is what it would mean to our players," Knight said.

"I remember the thrill of playing on an NCAA champion (with Ohio State in 1960). Either our kids or

Syracuse, Hoosiers vie for NCAA title

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Bob Knight and Jim Boeheim have both thrown chairs in anger at basketball games. The difference is in how they threw them.

The coaches — Knight of Indiana and Boeheim of Syracuse — take their teams into the championship game of the NCAA basketball tournament Monday night.

They are a study in contrasting styles, although they have one thing in common: Both have been very successful.

In 22 years of coaching, the last 16 at Indiana, Knight has a record of 467-169, and has won two national titles. While never winning the national championship, Boeheim has a career mark of 261-83 in 11 seasons at Syracuse.

Knight is the tough guy, the basketball genius who spends his off hours fly fishing and reading World War II history. His hero is said to be Gen. George Patton.

Boeheim, on the other hand, is the whiner, the guy who couldn't win the big one, a former golf coach and 8-handicapper.

Knight is in the news nearly as often for his own antics as he is for the accomplishments of his team. He got into trouble with the law in Puerto Rico during the 1979 Pan American Games, then stuffed a Louisiana State fan into a garbage can in a Cherry

Like Knight, Boeheim is emotional on the sidelines during games, but he recognizes that his reputation is not unmarked. "People don't say I'm a good coach," he said earlier in the NCAA tournament. "They don't say I'm a bad coach. They say I'm not bad."

Boeheim has taken the Orangemen into the NCAA tournament nine times, but had never gotten past the second round until this year.

When he threw his chair, it was in the privacy of the press room during the 1983 Big East Conference tournament.

"I tend to think in terms of our program," Boeheim said Sunday at a news conference. "If people respect our program, then I think they'll have some respect for me. I'm not really concerned from the 'me' aspect, though. So much is made by the media of success in the NCAA tournament — and wrongly so, I think. I could have been beaten in the first round, and I guess then I'd still have been a lousy coach."

Knight, too, professes little personal interest in winning another national title, even though he would join Adolph Rupp and John Wooden as the only three-time winners.

"The only significance at this point for me is what it would mean to our players," Knight said.

K-State Rugby Club and the Kansas City Blues team members battle for the ball during a Division One Merit Table match Saturday at the KSU Rugby Field. The Blues beat K-State 21-6. K-State will travel to Nebraska this Saturday to play the Lincoln Rugby Football Club.

Rugby team battles weather

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

A little bad weather didn't stop K-State's rugby squad Saturday, but the powerful Kansas City Blues did as they defeated the Wildcats, 21-6, in Manhattan.

On a day when the elements forced the cancellation of most other outdoor events in the area, K-State head coach and senior kicker Bill Knopick said it takes very severe weather to bring a rugby contest to a halt.

"In rugby it pretty much has to be tornado or severe lightning to cancel out the game. The snow or the rain or the wind really has no bearing on it, we just go ahead and play," Knopick said.

With a strong north wind, accompanied by freezing rain, players from both squads donned only the traditional rugby garb — a rugby shirt, shorts, thick wool socks and cleats.

Knopick said the cold weather definitely had an impact on the teams' strategies to win.

"On days like that, it's kind of hard to get out and get fired up and motivated," Knopick said. "But when it's muddy like that, the whole game plan revolves around the scrum, because the backs have trouble handling the ball and the conditions make it difficult to pass well."

The difficulty to pass well became evident as the game wore on as K-State scored its only points on penalty kicks via Knopick's foot.

K-State's intital score came midway through the first half when Knopick booted a 20-meter penalty kick to bring the 'Cats back to within four points, 7-3, following a try and a conversion kick by Kansas City.

Four points was as close as K-State was destined to come, though, as the Blues rolled up 14 second-half points through the muck and mire to put the game out of reach.

Knopick scored on another penalty kick in the second half, but the older, more-experienced Kansas City team proved to be too tough for the younger K-State squad.

Knopick said because the game was based on physical strength rather than speed and quickness, K-State's squad was at a distinct disadvantage.

"If you noticed, their pack oversized ours by probably a good 400 pounds. They were just big guys and their size and experience was what beat us," Knopick said.

Experience was a factor because this was a club match rather than a collegiate one, which means both clubs can have players older and more experienced than college students.

"Whenever you face rookies up with people that have played for maybe nine years, there's a little bit of difference there," Knopick said.

Knopick said the K-State team — rookies or not — would benefit greatly from playing such stiff competition once the collegiate season rolls around.

"Playing teams that have powerful packs like that is probably the best thing our team could do at this point to further our experience and knowledge of the game.

"There is no better competition that we could play. I'm sure that most of the other college teams aren't playing as good of teams we are," Knopick said. "I've got a feeling it's going to give us an edge."

It was K-State's first loss of the spring season. The team, now 3-1, was on a three-game winning streak after defeating Nebraska, 21-0, and the Greater Omaha Area Touring Squad (G.O.A.T.S.), 13-9.

Outdoor track opens with 'Cats placing 12

Three first-place finishes and 12 top-three placings were captured by K-State's track teams Saturday at the Texas A&M College Station Relays.

No team scores were kept at the first outdoor meet of the season for the Wildcat tracksters.

Doug Brown took first in the javelin throw at 211-feet-8, and Pinkie Suggs received two gold medals in the shot put and discus.

Suggs set a school and meet record with her winning toss of 54-10 1/ in the shot put. The throw also qualifies her for the NCAA finals, June 3-6 in Baton Rouge, La.

In the women's 1,500-meter run, Jacque Struckhoff ran her first meet after recovering from a stress fracture in her leg and took second.

Other women's results were Anita Isom, second in 100-meter dash; Kelly Abernathy, second in discus; Wendy Atkins, third in javelin; and Kim Kilpatrick, third in 100-meter hurdles.

Men's results were Dan Myers, second in shot put; Brad Speer, second in high jump; Richard Kroll, third in javelin; Dan O'Mara, third in discus; and the 1600-meter relay team took third.

Men's Individual Results

Shot put — 2. Dan Myers, 57-10.

Improving on 1986 starts today at spring football practices

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

K-State's edition of its 1987 football team will kick things off at 4 p.m. today when spring practice officially commences at KSU Stadium.

Coach Stan Parrish enters his second year as helmsman of the Wildcats. He "feels good" about his 80-member spring squad, which returns 34 lettermen and 18 seniors.

Parrish is optimistic this nucleus is up to the task of improving K-State's 2-9 1986 record.

"I think we're a more together football team," Parrish said. "I think we're a little more goal-oriented football team. We have to go out and prove to everybody we can get things done.

"I really thought we had a meaningful off-season program," he added. "We had less talking and more work. That's a good sign our older players have put themselves in a leadership role in our program. I think they want to win."

The importance of good attitudes is something Parrish can't emphasize enough.

"From an attitudinal standpoint, I think the kids are in very, very good shape and that's very important when you're trying to make a losing program into a winning program."

Parrish's goal during spring practice, which concludes May 2 with the varsity-alumni game, is to solidify his team as a unit.

"We want to come together attitudinally as a team," he said. "Offense, defense and kicking are one and the same. We obviously want to solidify our quarterbacking position also. The position is wide open. It's going to be interesting."

Tim Hanson, a 6-foot-1, 190-pound senior, started the Wildcats' last game and is first on the pre-season depth chart at quarterback. Others who will challenge for the position are Gary Swim — a highly recruited transfer from Snow (Utah) Community College — and two redshirt freshmen Chris Cobb and Carl Straw, who is listed at No. 2 going into spring drills.

The quarterback situation will become more complicated this fall when Park Hill High School (Kansas City, Mo.) star Paul Watson, one of the top prep players in the Midwest, arrives.

Parrish said several top players won't be participating in spring drills. Grady Newton, "one of the top outside linebackers in the Big Eight," Todd Cowings, "a fine junior college receiver," and returning fullbacks Ray Wilson and Maurice Henry will be held out of practices. All of them are rehabilitating from surgery to remedy last-season injuries.

"This will hurt us a little bit," Parrish said. "They will be ready to play in the fall, but now it temporarily stops our progress with those kids."

Parrish cited several strengths of his team. The receiver position has good depth with six returners. In addition to Cowings, Dan Hughes, John Williams, Lawrence Tolbert, Eric Blades and Kent Dean will be in action again for the Wildcats. Transfer Darrell Wyatt from Trinity Valley (Texas) Community College also joins the receiving corps.

K-State's secondary should also be strong. Last year, Parrish started three freshmen — Erick Harper, Tyreese Herds and Marcus Miller — for much of the season. Willie Halliburton and Rob Easterwood should also strengthen this position.

Hughes, the 5-11, 165-pound senior wide receiver, led K-State in receiving with 28 catches for 413 yards. Harper, a 6-0, 190-pound sophomore defensive back, was the Wildcats' top tackler in 1986 with 54.

Porter, a place-kicker, led the team in scoring with 44 points and has been successful on 18 of 24 field-goal attempts in two seasons at K-State.

Jordan, a 6-3, 220-pound running back, was a second team United Press International All-Big Eight selection last year and earned honorable mention on the Associated Press' squad.

Parrish said K-State's main weaknesses are on the offensive and defensive lines where there will be "a lot of new faces." On the offensive line, guard Matt Garver and center Rob Goode return. The other three positions are open.

Defensively, the loss of starters Kevin Humphrey and Jeff Hurd leaves two key vacancies at the tackle position. Expected to challenge for starting-line spots are Tim MacDonald, John Crawford, Mark Young, Jim Oehm, Rick Lewis and transfer Brandon Wackerly.

Tennessee Lady Vols capture NCAA crown

By The Associated Press

AUSTIN, Texas — Sheila Frost came off the bench to score 13 points Sunday, igniting the Tennessee Lady Volunteers to their first NCAA women's basketball championship with a 67-44 rout of favored Louisiana Tech.

It was the first time Tennessee Coach Pat Head Summitt had earned the national title although she's had eight teams in the Final Four.

The victory came easier than expected over the Lady Techsters, 30-3, who had beaten the Lady Vols, 28-6, nine straight times, including a 72-60 triumph in February.

It was sweet revenge for the Lady Vols, who had been defeated three times in the Final Four by Louisiana Tech. Tennessee is 2-11 against Tech.

Tough rebounding and a tenacious, overplaying defense that denied the passing lanes won the game for the Southeastern Conference champions.

Tennessee held high-scoring Tori Harrison to eight points and All-American Teresa Weatherspoon had only 11 points. Nora Lewis was high for the losers with 12.

Tennessee took advantage of a seven-minute cold spell by the Lady Techsters to run off a 13-5 spurt and a 33-24 halftime lead.

Paulette Stall tied the score at 19 with a basket at 7:11, but the Lady Techsters couldn't score again until Lewis hit a shot with 11 seconds left in the half.

Student wins trip through driving skill

Junior outraces 541 hopefuls

By SANDRA M. SIEBERT
Collegian Reporter

Having proven his driving skills Thursday, a K-State student will be flown to Daytona, Fla., in April to compete in the Grand Finals of the National Collegiate Driving Championships.

Greg Williamson, junior in mechanical engineering, won the Collegiate Driving Championship conducted Thursday and Friday at K-State. It was part of a national competition conducted at almost 100 universities across the United States.

Williamson's winning time was 15.47 seconds.

Entrants in the competition drove around a serpentine-shaped track marked by orange pylons and a white chalk line. The first time around the track was a practice run to familiarize the driver with the car, which was locked into first gear. The second round was timed.

Pylons that were knocked down were counted both times around, with each downed pylon adding a second to the time. If two wheels of the car went over the white line the car was shut off with a remote control and the driver was disqualified.

Williamson said he entered the competition for the fun of it and had no idea he would win.

Second-place winner was Jeff Passantino, freshman in pre-design professions. Passantino received a road emergency kit with a citizen's band radio.

If Williamson is unable to compete in the finals in Daytona, Passantino will take his place. Passantino's time was 15.641 seconds.

Third place was taken by Mathew Kwartin, senior in biology, with a time of 15.70 seconds. Kwartin received a cooler as third prize.

Winners of the national finals will

Thrilling to compete in trials

It may not have been the Indianapolis 500, but it was still a thrill to drive the Dodge Daytona Shelby Z last week in a race against the clock at the National Collegiate Driving Championships.

Even if it was only 18.574 seconds long.

The wait in line was much longer than the actual race. But as soon as I got in behind the steering wheel of the sports car, I knew the five- to 10-minute wait was well worth it.

The car announces itself as a true sports car upon first glance. It has the sleek, powerful and mean look characteristic of many sports cars.

If that doesn't convince you that it is a car to reckon with though, the words "official sports car Dodge Daytona" are painted on the doors to make sure every onlooker knows this car is as sharp under the hood as it is outside.

The car was surprisingly luxurious on the inside. After strapping myself in tightly and turning on the radio, I decided it was time to see what the car could do.

Was I ever in for a surprise.

The first time around the curving course I took it slowly, being extra careful not to hit any pylons marking the confined boundaries I had to drive in.

Realizing the car had no noticeable body roll or sway in either the front or the rear end, I floored it coming around the sharp turn at the

Nationally ranked OSU hammers K-State, 16-6

What was scheduled to be a four-game weekend series against Big Eight Conference opponent Oklahoma State was reduced to a one-game losing stanza for K-State's baseball team Friday evening at Frank Meyers Field.

Due to poor weather conditions the two games scheduled for Saturday and one game on Sunday were cancelled.

Oklahoma State, 19-1 and ranked second in the nation, upped its winning streak to 12 by downing K-State, 16-6. The poison that beat the Wildcats was spread on the hot bats of the Cowboys who stung them for five home runs that accounted for 10 points of their total.

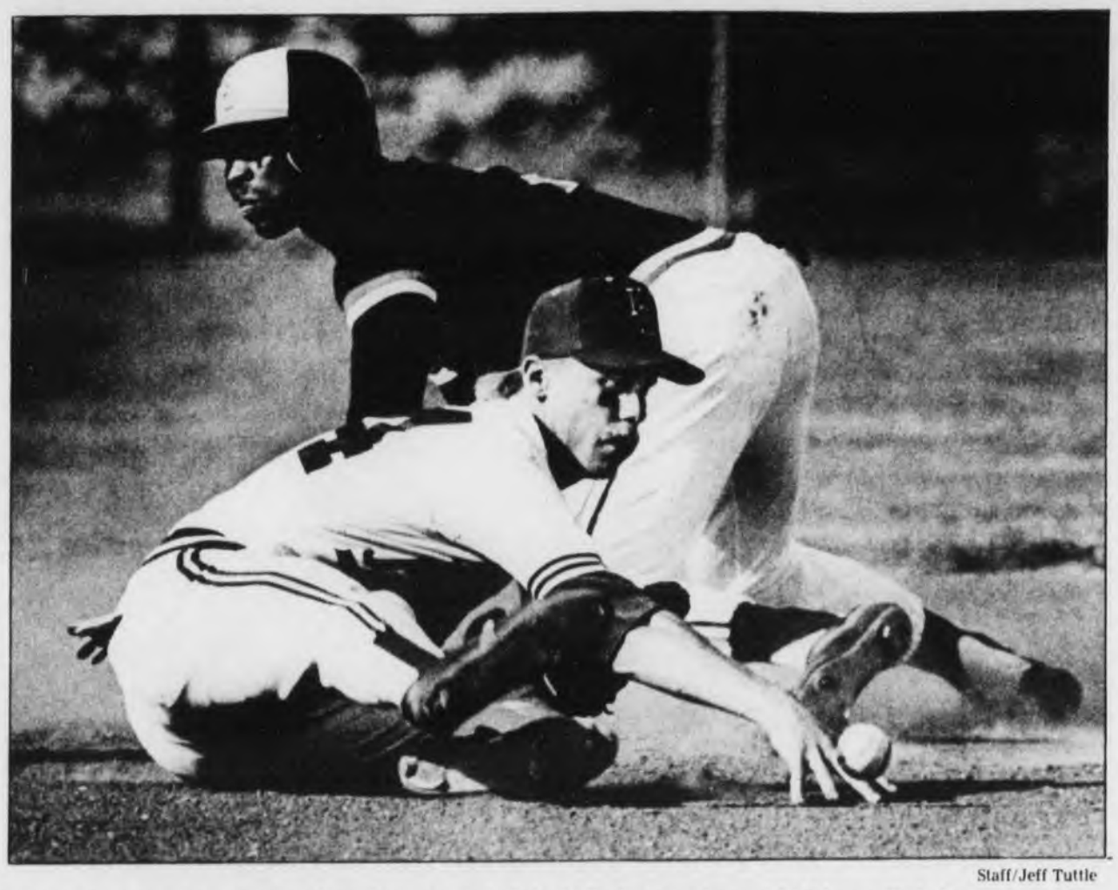
To defeat the Cowboys, the Wildcats knew they would have to come out strong in the first inning. But in face, they didn't.

Starting pitcher Rocky Ferguson, 2-3, walked three men and was nailed for a three-run homer by Jim Infland in the first inning alone, which gave Oklahoma State an early 3-0 lead. "Rocky has to get the low strike to be effective and the umpire wasn't giving it to him," Clark said. "With these hitters, one little mistake and it's over the fence."

Things didn't ease up early for the 'Cats either, as the Cowboys scored two more off a Jaime Barragan two-run blast early in the third, putting them up 5-0 off only three hits.

This, coupled with a hitless and scoreless first and second innings for K-State, dug a considerable hole for the 'Cats.



In the third, the Wildcats found themselves back in the game when Scott Spangenberg doubled and scored off a sacrafice fly by Russ Ringgenberg.

The 'Cats added to that in the fourth when Eric Haines and Spangenberg had RBI singles and Ringgenburg collected his second sacrifice of the game.

The run on Oklahoma State didn't last long as Anthony Blackman led off for the Cowboyss in the top of the fifth and hit his first of two home runs. O-State collected one more run in the fifth, and nailed K-State for five runs in the seventh thanks largely to Adam Smith's three-run homer.

Oklahoma State scored four more in the eighth when the game was called due to the ten-run rule.

Friday's game was the first of K-State's conference schedule. The 'Cats take their 10-10 overall mark into Tuesday's game at Creighton University.

start/finish line. The turbo-charger kicked in after a short delay and the car picked up speed rapidly.

After what seemed only a few short seconds I crossed the finish line, feeling good about the race even though I was certain I had knocked over a couple of pylons.

As I stepped out of the car and unstrapped the helmet, I anxiously looked around for the downed pylons — none of which were to be found.

Then I heard over the loudspeaker I had recorded a time of 18.574 without knocking down a single cone.

So I didn't win or even come close. There's always next year and I plan to be at the front of the line then.

DEATH OF A BUREAUCRAT
Alea's first major film is an entertaining, blackly hilarious attack on galloping bureaucracy, audaciously mixing slapstick farce and paranoid nightmare. The story tells of a young man's attempts to disinter and re-bury his uncle—a move that lands him at odds with official regulations. Into this dilemma, Alea works a dense chain of allusions to film comedy, from the anarchic tradition of Buñuel and Vigo, to the satire of Billy Wilder, to the custard-pie classicism of the great silent comedians.

told them after entering the hospital with lymphadenopathy, a swelling of the lymph nodes. The same day, he was diagnosed with ARC.

"It was rough for them — it still is," he said.

The percentage of ARC patients who develop AIDS is unclear, but ARC is believed by many experts to be a probable successor of AIDS.

People with ARC live constantly with the fear of getting AIDS, and in January Tom thought he had crossed the line. He was admitted to the hospital with a bad cough and was afraid he had Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia, the primary infectious disease contracted by AIDS patients.

What he had was an unidentifed infection, but he experienced immense anxiety contemplating the idea of having AIDS.

"After you've been seriously sick and you think that you're going to die...and they tell you it's not (AIDS), you wish you had (died) — because then it would be over," he said.

"After being sick, living is not something you've enjoyed in the very recent past," he said. "Depression is a very serious problem."

Because of the misconception that AIDS can be spread through casual contact, some people fear being near people with the virus, but Tom said he has only had one or two people shun him since he was diagnosed.

"It wasn't that they didn't want to be my friend; it's just that they didn't understand and didn't want to deal with it."

Homosexuals account for about 75 percent of AIDS cases nationally.

The magnitude of the number can be attributed to the typically large number of partners and the form of sex of homosexuals. Tom said during six years of sexual activity before being diagnosed he had about 250 different partners.

"I would go from one relationship to another in a few days and not feel the least bit guilty," he said.

He said heterosexuals should not feel safe by comparing the number of partners they have had with his figure because it only takes one person with the virus to expose another.

"It doesn't matter how many people you sleep with; it's how many sexual encounters you have with someone who has the antibody," he said.

About 1.5 million people in the United States have tested positive for the AIDS virus antibody. While the majority of those people do not have AIDS, they are contagious and can spread the disease.

Since learning of his illness, Tom has practiced "safe sex," (using a condom) with his partners. He has only had sex with a few people since he was diagnosed, and all knew he had ARC.

"I have practiced safe sex, but it's very difficult because you feel guilty" because of the chance of transmitting the virus, he said.

A major difference in his sexual practices is that now he has sex with people he cares about.

"Back then I didn't have sex with friends; now I have friendships with my lovers."

Most homosexuals are not as promiscuous as they typically used to be, and many now use condoms, he said.

Compact

for member-states who withdraw themselves or have their membership revoked for refusal to abide by the guidelines of the compact.

Withdrawal from the compact, unless unanimously approved by the member states, does not become effective for five years. During this time, the withdrawing state must continue to pay its share of the financial commitment "to ensure the continued availability of safe and economical waste management facilities for all remaining party states."

States whose membership is revoked may also be required to uphold their financial responsibility.

Attorney General Bob Stephan has issued an opinion that pulling out of the compact could cost the state as much as $25 million — $5 million for its part in building at a compact site and $20 million to build a state facility.

Peery said if Kansas passes a law to ban underground low-level waste disposal, it "hasn't necessarily gone against the stipulations of the compact" because the commission has not yet decided if the storage facility should be above or below ground.

"The (members of the) compact (are) looking at all alternatives except shallow-land burial," he said, including both above- and below-ground storage facilities.

Many states have banned shallow-land burial, an inexpensive method of waste storage in horizontal trenches.

Even if Kansas doesn't remain in the compact, the state is required to build a facility for storage of low-level radioactive waste that will be fully operational by 1993, according to the Low-Level Radioactive Waste Policy Act as amended in 1985.

The state would incur total building costs for a "strictly Kansas" waste disposal facility, but without a compact agreement, the state may be required to accept any waste produced in other states not in regional compacts.

The Interstate Commerce Clause of the U.S. Constitution prohibits states from discriminating "against articles of commerce coming from outside the state unless there is some reason, apart from their origin, to treat them differently."

Whether or not this would apply to low-level radioactive waste will probably have to be decided in court, Peery said.

"That's interpretation of constitutional law," he said. "It would be a hell of a battle."

Dollar plunges as investors worry

NEW YORK — A historic plunge in the dollar's value put a scare into bull markets around the world Monday as investors worried about an unrestrained decline in the U.S. currency and the outside chance of a trade war.

The prices of stocks and bonds plunged in Tokyo, London and New York in reaction to the dollar's fall. The U.S. currency hit its lowest point against the Japanese yen since modern exchange rates were established in the late 1940s.

Traders said they were worried in part by President Reagan's plan to impose prohibitive tariffs on up to $300 million worth of Japanese electronic goods to force Japanese into compliance with a trade agreement on computer chips.

"It seems like the United States is trying to play hardball here, and the ramifications are quite severe," said Randy Holland, a foreign currency options trader for Donaldson, Lufkin & Jenrette Securities Corp.

The dollar broke through new lows steadily last week and again Monday despite the purchase of at least $10 billion on the open market by the central banks of Japan and, to a lesser degree, the United States and other industrial nations.

Marines charge guard with spying

WASHINGTON — All the Marine guards stationed at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow will be returned to the United States next month in a "precautionary" move, the State Department and Marine Corps said Monday.

The contingent of Marine guards "will be replaced by Marine security guards stationed in other posts around the world or by Marines drawn from the Marine Security Headquarters in Quantico, Va.," the corps and department said in a joint statement.

The move follows last week's word that the corps suspects two former guards of allowing Soviet agents to roam through the embassy at night on "numerous and diverse occasions" last year, poking through sensitive communication facilities and offices.

The corps has charged Sgt. Clayton J. Lonetree with 24 spying-related counts of misconduct, including two capital charges of espionage. Cpl. Arnold Bracy is being held in confinement pending the start of a pre-trial investigation.

'Platoon' wins best picture Oscar

Woody Allen's "Hannah and Her Sisters," a comedy about affluent Manhattan neurotics, brought him a screenplay award and supporting acting honors to Dianne Wiest and Michael Caine.

"A Room With a View," a comedy of manners set in turn-of-the-century England and Italy, won three early awards, for costume design, art direction and for Ruth Prawer Jhabvala's adaptation of E.M. Forster's novel. "Room" had tied "Platoon" for most nominations with eight.

Newman had been the sentimental favorite to finally win the top acting award after receiving his seventh nomination this year for the role of the aging pool shark Fast Eddie Felson, a sequel to his earlier "The Hustler." He won a special Oscar last year for his career achievements.

Oliver Stone was named best director for "Platoon," and the film also picked up Oscars for best sound and film editing at the 59th annual Academy Awards.

Officials suggest polygraph licenses

TOPEKA — State law enforcement officials told a Senate committee Monday Kansas should require those who give lie detector tests to be licensed by the state to prevent abuses, but they disagreed over what types of tests should be included.

Tom Kelly, director of the Kansas Bureau of Investigation, spoke in support of the bill for the KBI and for the attorney general's office at a hearing before the Senate Governmental Organizations Committee.

Polygraph tests, which measure cardiovascular, respiratory and skin responses to determine whether people are telling the truth, are often used by law enforcement agencies or by private companies before they hire people.

Steve Starr, president of the Kansas Polygraph Association, said his organization frequently hears complaints about abuses by persons giving polygraph tests. Other professions, such as cosmetologists, have state regulatory boards, he said, but polygraphy doesn't.

"And polygraphy can make the difference whether a person gets a job or is incarcerated," Starr said.

The bill would establish a five-member board to license polygraph examiners. To be licensed, examiners would have to have a four-year college degree or two years of college and two years of experience as a law-enforcement investigator. They also would have to complete at least 250 hours of polygraphy training, serve a supervised internship and pass written and practical exams.

Committee delays death bill vote

TOPEKA — Despite a gubernatorial promise of action, the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee failed to act Monday on a proposal to reinstate capital punishment in Kansas because two members of the panel were absent.

Sen. Neil Arasmith, R-Phillipsburg, was snowed in at his home following a weekend blizzard in western Kansas. Sen. Norma Daniels, D-Valley Center, was absent to attend her father's funeral.

"It's not appropriate to act on such an important issue when everyone's not here," said Sen. Ed Reilly, R-Leavenworth and committee chairman. "On an issue as important as this, everyone wants to be present and vote."

The bill has been in Reilly's committee two full months since passing the House on Jan. 30. Gov. Mike Hayden has been pressing for action and said last Thursday that Reilly has promised to bring the bill up for a vote Monday.

Reilly did not know Monday when the committee might bring the death penalty bill up for a final vote.

Trial begins in poisoned oil case

MADRID, Spain — An angry crowd threw stones Monday at defendants emerging from the opening session of the trial in the poison cooking oil case that killed at least 584 people six years ago.

Prosecutors say the 38 defendants should serve thousands of years in jail and pay millions of dollars in fines for selling the toxic imitation olive oil.

Thousands of people, many related to victims, gathered outside the exhibition hall in a park on the outskirts of Madrid, where authorities created a makeshift courtroom. The trial, where charges include homicide and fraud, is expected to last about six months.

Some in the crowd cursed and threw stones when the defendants emerged from the building after the morning session. Stones hit Adela Jaraute Martinez, the only woman among those on trial, as her lawyer led her to a waiting car.

Last Lecture Series to review dangers of democracy issue

By The Collegian Staff

Roger Trenary, instructor in economics, will explain what he feels are the dangers of democracy at 7 p.m. in the Union Little Theatre as part of the Last Lecture Series.

Trenary said people often picture the democratic decision-making process as ideal simply because it is what they are accustomed to.

"People don't realize there are several other options (than democracy)," he said.

The open marketplace, for example, is a better indicator of the type and amount of goods the country should produce, he said.

"I see no good reason why we should try to expand the role of the democratic decision-making process," he said. "We should let these types of decisions stay in the marketplace."

Trenary, who has been at the University for almost 10 years, is the second faculty member to participate in the Last Lecture Series this semester. Speakers in the series are given the opportunity to give what would be their final words to the University before they would die.

Students to evaluate transfer system

By STACEY CAMPBELL
Collegian Reporter

Representatives from Kansas community colleges will be on campus Tuesday to visit with transfer students during the Community College Conference.

The purpose of the visits is to "share with community colleges the transfer student's successes and failures," said Barbara Dawes, associate director of admissions.

Transfer students will have the opportunity to consult with representatives between 10:45 a.m. and 12:30 p.m. in the Union.

"The community colleges benefit because they are able to talk with students," Dawes said. "For example, if the English class at the community college did not prepare the student for Composition II (an English composition class at K-State), the community college could go back and beef up its English program."

Representatives from all but one of the 18 Kansas community colleges will be available to talk with students. A K-State representative will be present to talk to Highland Community College students, and the information received from students will be fowarded to the college, Dawes said.

Representatives will review the transcript equivalency manual, which lists credits that will transfer to the University and credits equivalent to K-State classes.

Invitations were sent to 3,352 transfer students asking them to meet with their community college representatives, Dawes said. Transfer students received a questionnaire with the invitations focusing on the differences between K-State and the community college they attended.

"The questionnaire was sent to find out how the students feel about the transfer from community colleges to the University environment and to see if there is anything happening here or at the community college that the administrators could improve for the students," she said.

"Transfer students don't feel well enough informed about how credits transfer, or what classes they should be taking," Dawes said. "Students also felt that classes at K-State were much harder. The expectation for grades is more demanding (because) students must work harder at K-State to get the same level of grades."

Dawes said the students have a voice in the policy that takes place at the University. Changes don't occur overnight, "but what is important is the fact that steps were taken on a certain point," she said.

Commission hopefuls debate housing issues

By JEFFREY J. BIELSER
Staff Writer

A rental permit system is one way the city of Manhattan could enforce current housing codes, said the six city commission candidates at a forum Monday.

They were responding to a question about enforcement of current city housing codes at a meeting sponsored by the Manhattan League of Women Voters, Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and the Riley County Council of Social Agencies. Twenty-five people attended the discussion in the city administration building.

"The main concern is houses converted from single family to multi-family dwellings," said Kent Glasscock, president of Home Lumber Co.

He said many of those buildings were converted 10-20 years ago and were not built according to current building codes.

Safety and health factors are the main things that should be considered in any code enforcement, Glasscock said, echoing a sentiment expressed by all the candidates.

Where the city was lacking, if at all, in its enforcement of housing codes was also debated by the candidates.

Manhattan needs to "implement a rental permit system with teeth," said Roger Maughmer, a supervisor of the local Southwestern Bell Telephone office.

Putting "teeth" in housing code enforcement was another point shared by most candidates.

"We (the city) have a very good code enforcement, but we don't have the manpower to enforce it," said Nancy Denning, president of Denning, Buster and Hungate marketing agency.

One solution to the manpower problem might be to hire retired people with experience in the building trades, said Bob Newsome, K-State area extension director.

It is a problem of putting more money into the city's budget to hire more people to carry out inspections, she said.

Other concerns addressed by the candidates about housing code enforcement included the impact multi-family dwellings had on older neighborhoods, updating the city's building codes to current standards and the responsibility of screening between commercial and residential areas where necessary.

"We (the city) need to decide what kind of community we want to be," Glasscock said.

All the candidates agreed Manhattan should coordinate economic development activities with surrounding communities, in such a venture like the one tentatively approved between Manhattan and Junction City. The proposal, approved Monday, would allow the two cities to coordinate efforts for a regional industrial park and to make Manhattan Airport a regional facility.

"The time for isolationist attitudes has ended, if we don't (end them) we're going to die as a community," Denning said.

Communities involved should have common goals and agree to mutual benefits, Glasscock said.

The plan should not just be government to government, though, it should come from the grass roots as well, he said. This would include respective Chambers of Commerce and business associations.

Talk focuses on secrecy

Press has right to know, speaker says

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Americans should establish the need to know information about their government and national security, said Tonda Rush, assistant general counsel of the American Newspaper Publishers Association.

Rush, who spoke to more than 70 people about the press and national security Monday evening in the Union Cottonwood Room, said the press is a group of citizens who has no more access to information than the public.

But the public does not have the time to search out the information. Therefore, the press must represent the people. Consequently, when the press has a loss of access, the public loses access, Rush said.

The press and Americans have a "right to know," but they have not always had the opportunity to exercise this right, she said.

Rush said examples of the first conscious restraint of information to the public led back to the Revolutionary War. She also talked about the Grenada invasion and the barring of the "mouthy journalists" from accompanying the invasion.

The U-2 incident in 1960 with President Dwight Eisenhower was one example of the government being secretive and giving misleading information, Rush said.

"Lies have been told to the press and the American public," Rush said.

The spying incident against the Soviet Union caused Eisenhower to lose credibility in the eyes of the public, she said. In addition, there was a risk of a breakdown in arms reduction talks during that time, and the chance to avoid "nuclear hysteria" was lost.

It has been said the press caused the loss of the Vietnam War, Rush said, but it was the lack of information, not too much information, that brought about the loss. The American people did not understand why the United States was fighting, she said.

The public lost the right to question the "silly and wasteful things" the CIA does when the agency became exempt from the Freedom of Information Act in 1984, Rush said.

The FBI also can refuse the request for information if it believes the existence of the information is classified, she said.

The public "might want to have the right to know" about classified information, Rush said, but the government is purposely creating secrecy to protect the national security.

"What are we trying to protect here?" she said. "How much needs to be classified and how long do we need to keep it secret?"

Thatcher challenges Gorbachev to align deeds with words

By The Associated Press

MOSCOW — British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher challenged Soviet leader Mikhail S. Gorbachev on Monday to produce deeds that match his words about seeking better relations abroad and providing greater freedom at home.

Thatcher took Gorbachev to task specifically on human rights and the withdrawal of Soviet troops from Afghanistan.

"We will reach our judgments not on intentions or on promises but on deeds and on results," she said of Western leaders.

Gorbachev repeated the Kremlin position that it wants a political solution in Afghanistan, where Moslem insurgents have fought government troops since a communist coup in April 1978. An estimated 115,000 Soviet soldiers now are in the country.

He said the Soviets are ready to discuss human rights "openly and loudly" if the debate includes unemployment, homelessness and discrimination in the West.

"If we're going to talk about human rights, let's talk about all rights," Gorbachev said.

They spoke at a state banquet in the Grand Kremlin Palace on the third day of Thatcher's official visit.

Thatcher pressed the West's case for arms control, starting with elimination of medium-range nuclear weapons from Europe and restraints on shorter-range rockets.

Her attitudes are an important consideration for Gorbachev because Britain has its own nuclear arsenal and she has given strong support to U.S. defense policies.

Gorbachev accused the West of including "a package of conditions and demands on the Soviet Union" in proposals for an arms agreement.

"Instead of reductions in the nuclear arms arsenals, Europe is being offered a buildup of those arsenals, the deployment of American shorter-range theater missiles," he said. Gorbachev's reference was to statements by U.S. officials that Washington would consider converting some medium-range missiles to counter what it says is an overwhelming Soviet edge in short-range rockets.

Soviet officials oppose linking the shorter-range tactical weapons they have in Czechoslovakia and East Germany with an accord on the medium-range missiles both superpowers have in Europe.

The Conservative British prime minister restated her support of President Reagan's research project for a space-based defense system, commonly called "Star Wars," which the Soviets condemn. Western defense analysts say the Kremlin has a similar program.

As a means of quieting the current East-West debate on eventual deployment of space defenses, Thatcher proposed making a timetable for the research programs of both superpowers and a commitment not to withdraw from the 1972 antiballistic missile treaty for a fixed period.

Of human rights, she said: "The extent to which you, the Soviet government, meet the commitments which you have freely undertaken in the Helsinki Final Act will determine how far other countries and other peoples have confidence in the undertakings which you give on, for instance, arms control."

In Mexico, true journalism non-existent

I had hope. I guess we all did.

I wasn't with the 18 reporters and the new editor of The Mexico City News when they walked out of the newsroom for the last time a month ago, but I've an idea of their thoughts.

During a seven-month internship last year with the News, Mexico City's English-language daily with a circulation of 44,000, I had a chance to learn of a completely different environment of journalism. Not only was I exposed to the viewpoints of adventure-seeking writers from Canada, England, France and various parts of the United States, but to those of the Mexican publisher of the News.

Romulo O'Farrill Jr. is publisher of the News, a paper founded by his father to improve U.S.-Mexican ties. This man's idea of a "good" newspaper is one that doesn't offend any of his friends in the upper echelons of government.

O'Farrill wanted to reduce the coverage of the students' side, but the reporter continued to write, Hamill continued to play the stories front page and O'Farrill cracked down.

Hamill came to the News with an enthusiasm for giving readers a realistic view of Mexico, which few Americans have and Mexicans certainly don't read much about in their cities' dailies.

With O'Farrill's warning that reporters should expect more censorship in the future, the majority of the News staff followed Hamill out the door.

"We were all really sad," said Patty Reinert, former News reporter and K-State graduate. "Nobody wanted to keep trying if it would all be distorted coverage." The newspaper now is one big filler of wire stories and a few translations from other Mexican papers.

That's the problem in Mexico and in many countries where the ruling party feigns free speech by allowing newspapers to publish

SARAH KESSINGER
Arts/Entertainment Editor

while regulating their content through control of advertising, paper mills and payoffs to reporters. The bulk of advertising for Mexican newspapers comes from their government.

The incident at the News was a good example of a great misunderstanding between professionals of two very different cultures. O'Farrill is typical to almost any publisher in his country today.

During my time at the News, I had to remind myself where I came from while working with Mexican reporters who rarely asked pressing questions and received their "sobre" or envelope containing a few 10,000-peso bills after each government press conference.

I wasn't going to lower myself to what publishers expect of good reporters down there — and neither was one fellow staffer who covered the protests of election fraud in Chihuahua, a northern state; nor another writing on the sewage pumped into Acapulco's bay. (After all, we can't hinder those tourist dollars.) Several of their stories never made it to newsprint.

The News had lost its editorial voice last year thanks in part to former U.S. ambassador to Mexico John Gavin. After a speech stating that the Sandinistas' treatment of the Miskito Indians in Nicaragua was worse than the Nazi's treatment of the Jews in World War II, the News responded with an editorial calling the comparison an insult to the Jewish people.

Gavin, always sensitive to criticism, gave a smarting retort. An embassy statement to the paper described the editorial as "below contempt."

O'Farrill, not wanting to ruffle any of the ambassador's feathers, said no more editorials and imposed heavy regulation on news to which the embassy might be sensitive. Yes, that's our U.S. embassy in Mexico.

These are but a few examples of the gross underbelly of working for a newspaper in Mexico. I can't say I didn't enjoy it. Foreign reporters are treated like kings in Mexico. They're always well-received with typical Mexican cordiality. They're lavished with food and drink at receptions and inaugurations, and always, but always, treated to the best seat in the house, given only the best view of a country with a floundering economy and low morale.

At the News we couldn't consider ourselves foreign journalists; we didn't have the privilege of wiring a story back to the New York Times, Reuters or Tass offices in their home countries. We were only writing to send our stories down to the production area. It seemed rather ridiculous that the rest of the world could read about election fraud in Chihuahua while the News couldn't even inform the very people government corruption affected.

A Christian Science Monitor correspondent new to Mexico told me that most journalists he'd met there seemed resigned, while noting my complaining of Mexican journalism. Maybe now it's more clear to him who runs the printing presses.

Philadelphia police's failure led to tragedy

"Tales from the Dark Side" isn't just a TV show.

One impoverished neighborhood in the "City of Brotherly Love" became the focal point of a police investigation last week into a real-life house of horrors.

Philadelphia police found three starved, naked women shackled to a sewer pipe in the basement of a dilapidated house, 24 pounds of human limbs in the freezer and other body parts in the kitchen.

For more than a week, neighbors repeatedly reported the smell of burning flesh emanating from the house, which had a small white sign reading "United Church of the Ministries of God" tacked on the front.

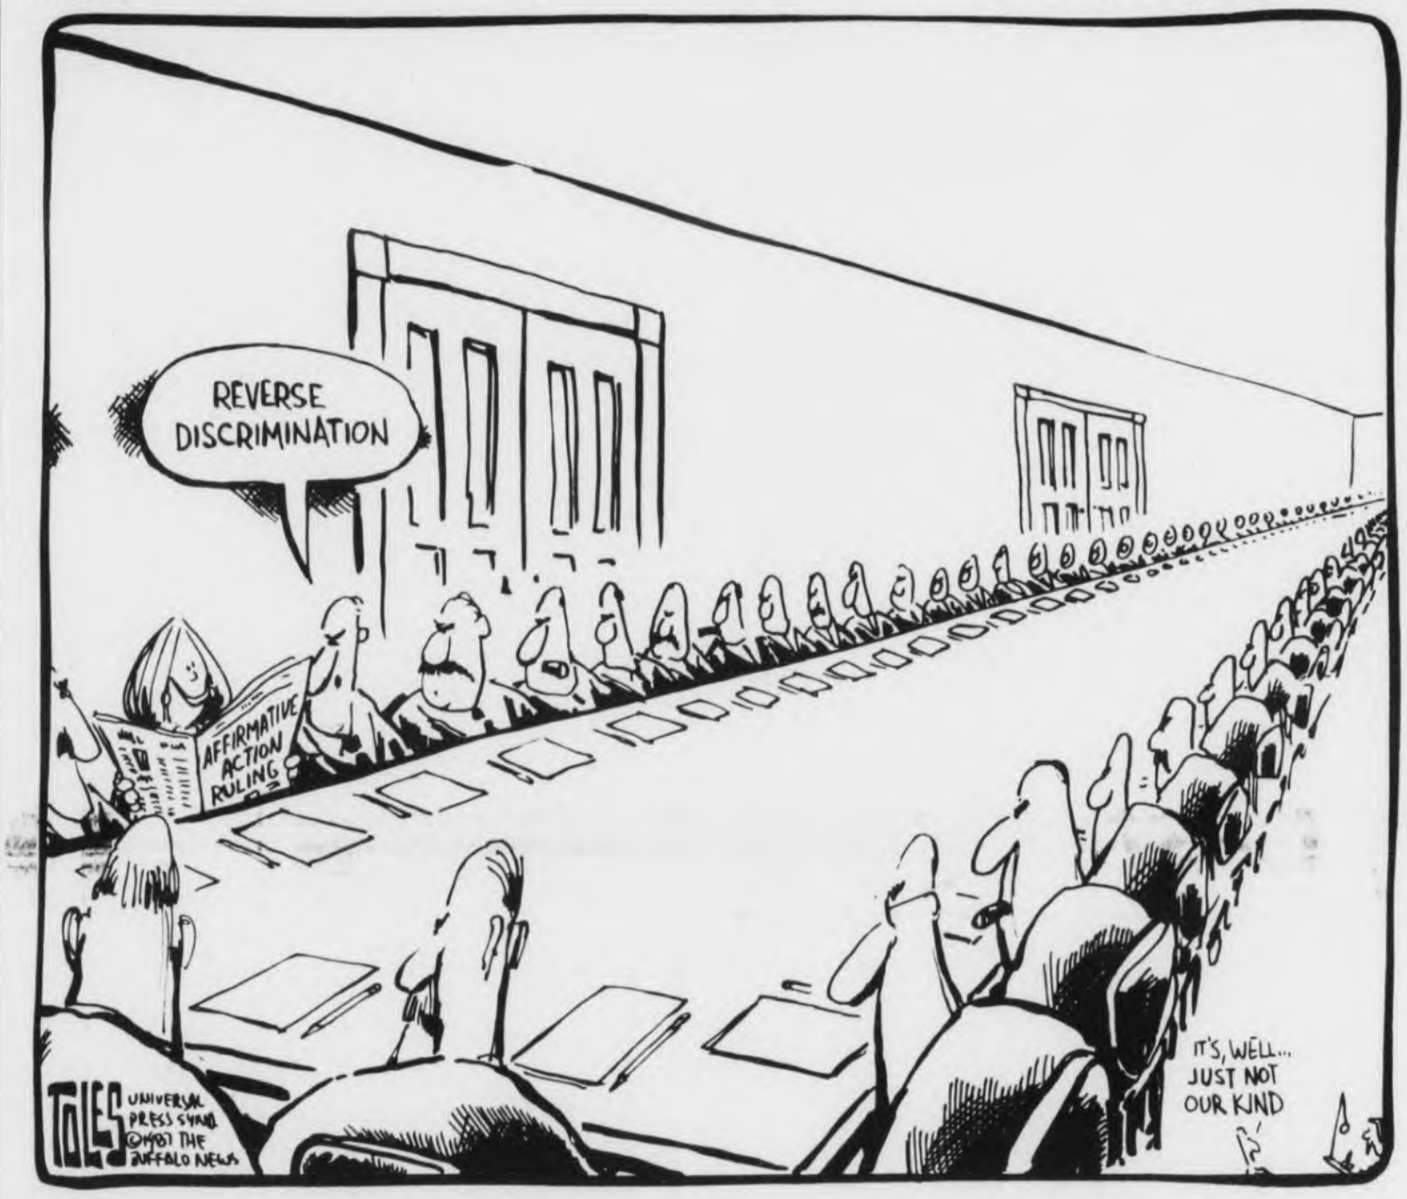
Fed water, bread and dog food, the women were sexually abused. Another woman, found partly buried under leaves and branches in a New Jersey forest, had been electrocuted after wires were apparently attached to her chains.

The mother of one dead captive said she told police her daughter was missing and that she frequented the "church."

But police did not investigate the complaint because the missing woman was an adult.

While this grisly tale is enough to destroy one's hope for humanity, the police department's lax attitude toward the complaints is more disturbing.

Granted, some complaints may seem trivial, especially those that most people would classify as annoyances. Officers patroling in areas where life-threatening crimes are the norm may find it difficult to take seriously a complaint about a peculiar odor or noise.



However, as evidenced by this story, what may seem to be a neighbor's simple prank or quirky habit may really be a life-threatening situation.

There is no excuse for the authorities' blatant disregard of citizens' complaints.

It is their job to investigate all complaints, from burglary to noisy parties, from rape to littering, from murder to loose dogs.

Police Capt. Robert Grasso said complaints about the police department's lax procedures would be investigated.

It is imperative that investigators' response be prompt.

Indian's court victory to set sweet precedent

Now that Cherokee-Creek Indian Austin Walker has gas and oil, he won't have to live in his car anymore.

Walker's case indicates that the injustices suffered by American Indians at the hands of the U.S. government and commerce continue, but it also shows that efforts are being made to turn this trend around.

In 1983, Walker, who signed away leasing rights to 40 acres he owned in Creek County, Okla., for $4,000, was uninformed of substantial oil and gas production on the land.

On March 19, Walker was awarded $685,368 in a successful suit against the federal government. U.S. District Judge H. Dale Cook's decision was stating the obvious point mysteriously overlooked before: The Office of the Solicitor with the Bureau of Indian Affairs should not have allowed an attorney representing Bristow Resources Inc., an oil company, to also represent Walker's interests.

"Every person in the courtroom on Oct. 10, 1983, except for Austin Walker, knew there was substantial oil production on the plaintiff's land," Cook said.

Obviously, the Bureau of Indian Affairs did not handle this situation in the best interests of its client, but instead opted for cold, hard, oil-industry cash.

Indians and other minorities have been the unwitting victims of industry and business for long enough. If Walker's case sets a precedent for other Indians, more will be allowed to finally claim what was unfairly taken from them.

Thankless dedication

GLRC works to assist, inform

K-State's Gay and Lesbian Resource Center has in the past year become one of the Manhattan community's most important groups and deserves a hearty dose of recognition for its hard work in bettering the community.

Does this statement sound a bit shocking? How can a group that has for so long been wrongly and ignorantly viewed by many as a bunch of perverted, AIDS-spreading homos who are better left IN the closet be held in such high esteem by not only myself but many others from the heterosexual population?

K-State's GLRC has in past years been active almost exclusively within the homosexual community by providing an information resource center and by serving as a social focal point for its gay members as well as for non-gay friends of members who want to better understand their gay friends.

This year, though, has had GLRC members working and dedicating themselves more than ever before. GLRC has reached out to the Manhattan community at large on a path hell-bent on furthering education, understanding and true caring for a cause of the greatest importance — the cause of living a healthy life. This rallying point at which most of their work has been centered has been the issue of AIDS.

This week GLRC is sponsoring AIDS Awareness Week on campus. The events taking place cover everything from the medical and psychological aspects to the social aspects of AIDS. Next week will top off the massive amount of information that will be provided throughout this week in the form of an entire day of AIDS Education Training. This session, sponsored by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment with GLRC, is scheduled for 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. April 11 at the University Inn. The event is for people interested in learning how to conduct AIDS educational presentations to groups. The event is by reservation only. Reservations can be made by calling the GLRC office.

A word or two must be said about the GLRC office. Talk about a group of gay people literally being "in the closet." When I went to the GLRC office to get information for this column, I was surprised to see that no actual office existed. I interviewed my source while standing in a dark, out of the way closet-size corner of the basement of Holton Hall. But that little room contains a wealth of information.

PATTI PAXSON

Patrick Orth, junior in interior design and co-president of GLRC, made sure I was loaded down with all the latest information on AIDS. I walked out of the office with such pamphlets as "Coping With AIDS," "AIDS and Your Job — Are There Risks?," "Alcohol, Drugs and AIDS," "Women and AIDS," and "AIDS — What Every K-Stater Needs to Know." And let's not forget the condoms — one free to everyone seeking information on AIDS and safe sex.

The sad thing about the GLRC office, though, is that it may not exist when renovation of Holton Hall begins this year. All the offices in Holton will be temporarily moved out, but GLRC is at great risk of not getting a place to operate while renovation is taking place. GLRC plays an essential role on this campus and it not only should continue to maintain its closet-office, but the University could at least revamp this valuable resource center into at least the size of a walk-in closet.

The number of AIDS seminars and lectures that GLRC has put on in just this academic year is astounding. GLRC members have lectured to University classes and groups as well as the Manhattan community at large. With education being the key to stopping the deadly disease, GLRC has performed above and beyond the call of duty with its tireless efforts to help people understand AIDS.

Through a state-funded grant, GLRC has been able to wage its battle against AIDS. Besides all the lecturing, teaching and information sessions that GLRC undertakes, the group is also preparing to undertake a survey of the University population on behalf of the state in order to determine what people do and don't know about AIDS. It is hoped that the results of such a survey will provide further direction on where AIDS education should go for our particular community.

Through groups such as GLRC, the war against AIDS has been officially declared across the nation. The seriousness of this disease cannot be stressed enough. Though many heterosexuals are no longer ignorant enough to think that they are out of reach of the long arm of AIDS, there still is a large portion of the heterosexual population who is playing a deadly game.

If you are sexually active, or have shared needles during drug use or have received blood transfusions between 1977 and 1985, then you are at risk. AIDS is not a disease that strikes based on your sexual preference. Rather, it is a disease that is just plain human. If you have any doubt whatsoever that you may be at risk of having AIDS, you can go to the Riley County Health Department at 2030 Tecumseh Road in Manhattan. There is also a test site at the Geary County Health Department at 119 E. Ninth St. in Junction City. If you are having second thoughts about your health in regard to AIDS, do yourself and others a favor — get tested.

Remember, as far as sex is concerned, when you are sexually involved with someone, you are taking on the sexual histories of all the other people that person has had sex with. It sounds crazy, but just think about it. Their history becomes your history.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR pertaining to matters of public interest are encouraged. All letters must be typewritten or neatly printed and signed by the author and should not exceed 300 words.

Disease committee to direct University plan

Editor's Note: This is the second in a daily five-part series dealing with AIDS. On Wednesday, a summer intersession course on AIDS will be examined and a speech by William Wade, a Topeka specialist on sexually transmitted diseases lecturing on the medical aspects of AIDS, will be covered.

Nearly a year after the University decided to form the University Committee on Communicable Diseases, a more comprehensive offshoot of the former University AIDS Committee, the committee is in the final stages of being organized, said William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services.

"We're just in the process of appointing that committee," Sutton said. The committee's primary goal will be education about the AIDS virus, he said.

Fred Newton, director of the Counseling Center, is chairman of the committee. The committee, which he expects to be formed in about a week, will carry out the goals of the University's policy statement on AIDS, he said.

"The committee's being formed as a direct result of the policy statement," Newton said. The policy statement, "Kansas State University Guidelines for AIDS, ARC (AIDS-related complex) and AIDS Virus," was approved May 2, 1986, by Sutton and former University President Duane Acker. The statement is a 14-page guide which details how the University will respond to AIDS-related questions or dilemmas.

"We were trying to get ahead of the game, and this is what this is all about," Newton said of the committee.

The University's policy statement outlines a number of different aspects surrounding AIDS and how the University community should respond to both real and imagined dangers.

The opening paragraph of the statement reads: "The administration of Kansas State University has therefore chosen to prepare ahead of time for the eventuality that a student, staff or faculty member may be diagnosed as having AIDS...."

Robert Tout, director of Lafene Student Health Center, said he knew of one person with AIDS who attended K-State last semester, but he does not know if the student enrolled this semester. The student's professors were aware of his illness, and that person followed the guidelines outlined in the policy, Tout said.

Highlights of the policy statement include provisions dealing with the following areas:

Lafene Student Health Center. "Keeping Lafene personnel informed on matters related to AIDS will be handled through ongoing orientation and in-service programs. Special procedures have been implemented for staff members who, because of their particular jobs, might come into contact with substances from AIDS patients or AIDS carriers.

"Lafene policies protect the patient's right to confidential treatment and safeguards assure the confidentiality of medical records." The statement also encourages students, faculty and staff to have blood tests if they believe they have been exposed to the virus.

Housing. "Residence hall, family housing and employment opportunities in the Department of Housing will be made available to persons with AIDS....In addition, attempts will be made to meet the special housing needs of those afflicted....The University recognizes the independent nature of greek Chapter Houses and offers them the educational, health and student service resources of the University community...."

Classrooms/Laboratories. "The risk of contracting AIDS in the classroom is considered so unlikely that no particular procedures are recommended....When an AIDS patient is involved in a laboratory accident that breaks the skin, the laboratory instructor or anyone who may assist the injured person should be aware of the situation. In other words, the injured person should inform the people assisting him or her of the circumstances."

Athletic Activities. "Persons with AIDS...should discuss the advisability of participation in sports with their physician taking particular care to avoid contact sports which may produce collision injuries or wounds....Should wounds occur, the participant has the responsibility to inform the others of the possibility of contamination."

Employment. "...Employees with AIDS...will be treated for all work-related purposes in the same manner as persons who develop other kinds of illnesses. In addition, as required by non-discrimination laws protecting handicapped and disabled persons, the University will, on a case-by-case basis, make reasonable accommodations to help persons with AIDS carry out their work duties.

"...Because all medical evidence indicates that the AIDS virus is not transmitted during the preparation or serving of food or beverages or by close personal contact, food service workers, child care workers or others who perform personal services who find that they have contracted the AIDS virus will not be restricted from work unless they show evidence of other infection or illness for which any such employee would also be restricted."

District's AIDS policy affects health curricula

By CHAD L. SANBORN

While the Manhattan public schools' science and health curriculum already includes formal AIDS education, a curriculum revision will lead to more information for students, said Tom Hawk, secondary curriculum director.

"Every five to seven years we do curriculum revisions. Next year we will be looking into the science and health curriculum," he said. "I'm sure there will be greater emphasis placed on AIDS education."

However, Hawk said the USD 383 Board of Education will proceed cautiously in choosing educational material.

"There is a lot of information and disinformation right now about AIDS. We must be careful and think constructively about the materials we review," he said.

In addition, Hawk stressed professionalism by teachers in material presentation is as important as selecting the appropriate materials.

"Telling the students what they need to know in a mature manner is as important as the material itself," he said.

Hawk said the AIDS education programs may experience some resistance from local interest groups, but that is to be expected.

"We have to be careful when we deal with any issues that have the seeds of controversy," he said. "But the Board of Education does not serve special interest or pressure groups. The board's job is to represent the community as a whole."

Manhattan students first encounter formal AIDS education in seventh-grade health class. It is under the drug education section and concerns the relationship between AIDS and intravenous drug use, said Hildie Brooks, a Manhattan Middle School health instructor.

Brooks said the relationship between sex and AIDS is first formally addressed in the eighth-grade health class. It falls under the section of communicable diseases.

"We don't make a big deal about (AIDS education)," she said. "We give the information on prevention and answer the questions we are able to answer."

Detailed pamphlets on 'safe sex' to be furnished by Lafene

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

To decrease the chance of acquiring AIDS through possibly hazardous sexual acts, heterosexuals and homosexuals may need to re-evaluate their physical relationships, according to the American College Health Association.

Pamphlets on "safe sex" compiled by the ACHA give detailed information about sexual acts and alternative practices. K-State is a member of the ACHA, and Lafene Student Health Center will be receiving the explanatory pamphlets for distribution soon, said Robert Tout, director of Lafene.

About 1.5 million people in the United States have tested positive for the AIDS antibody. Presence of the antibody in the system shows that the virus is living in the body, but thus far the antibody has been able to ward off the virus, protecting the person from related physical ailments.

While the majority of those infected show no symptoms of the disease, they can transmit the virus.

AIDS is most often contracted through sexual contact when semen and other body fluids enter the system through open wounds or damaged blood cells, said Charles Wood, assistant professor of microbiology at the University of Kansas. Wood is currently studying the AIDS virus.

The virus must have an entryway to the blood stream but not necessarily through an open wound, he said.

"A protective layer of skin cells can slough off, (making an entryway) to live cells that could be susceptible," he said.

"Dangerous" intimate practices outlined in the pamphlet "Making SEX Safer," include unprotected vaginal and anal intercourse (intercourse without a condom), "internal watersports," urinating in another person's body, and other contact resulting in transfer of body fluid into the blood stream.

"Risky" acts include oral sex for both women and men, although male partners can decrease the risk by using a condom, open-mouth kissing that results in tissue damage or open-mouth kissing with a person who has cuts or sores in or around the mouth. "Dry kissing," light kissing when neither person has open cuts, is "probably safe," the pamphlets state.

Richard Keeling, chairman of the ACHA's AIDS Task Force and staff physician at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville, said so far there have been no reports of anyone testing positive for the AIDS antibody because of exposure by kissing.

The potency of the virus is unclear, and experts do not concur on the amount of exposure necessary for contraction of the virus.

Wood said he believes for a person to get the virus it "usually involves multiple exposure with carriers."

Tout disagreed. "This is not something that results from an accumulation of exposure," he said. "You can have intercourse one time and get AIDS."

Regardless of the number of exposures, Wood said he believes anyone testing positive for the AIDS antibody should not engage in sexual intercourse.

"I wouldn't recommend anyone with (the AIDS antibody) having sexual intercourse," he said.

William Wade, a Topeka specialist on sexually transmitted diseases who handles the majority of AIDS cases in the area said he believes condoms are adequate protection for people with the virus, as long as the other person is made aware of the risk involved.

Condoms are between 89-99 percent reliable in preventing spread of the virus, according to estimates by pharmacists and doctors.

However, Wood said even a 1 percent chance is too risky.

"Is anyone willing to take that risk?" he asked.

While intravenous drug use is a well-known way of spreading the disease, the pamphlet states that drugs used without a needle may also be harmful. Amyl nitrite (poppers), alcohol, marijuana and speed may make a person more susceptible to AIDS, according to the pamphlet.

Activities encourage interaction

By The Collegian Staff

"International Week," which began Monday, is a great opportunity for K-State students to see how people live in other countries and to make new friends, said Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center.

"A lot of people don't realize how international our campus is," she said. K-State has students from 92 countries.

"Where else can you meet so many people from so many different countries?" she said.

Davis said the week is designed to encourage interaction between international students and American students.

The week started with the "Children of the World Show" at noon Monday in the Union Courtyard. About 20 preschoolers modeled clothes from around the world.

A film festival will extend through the week with several movies being shown in the Union.

Other highlights of the week include live African music at noon Wednesday in the Union Courtyard, international exhibits of different cultures and nations Friday in the Courtyard and an international potluck dinner at 6:30 p.m. Saturday at the International Student Center.

"A lot of people have put a lot of time and energy into this program," Davis said. "They'll be encouraged to continue and expand next year if there is a good turnout."

Engineering student creates, directs Marlatt TV

By SHELLY SHAFFER
Collegian Reporter

There is a new kind of MTV on the air.

This MTV shows David Letterman segments, feature movies and serves as a vehicle for residence hall information.

Marlatt TV, commonly referred to by residents as MTV, is a closed-circuit network with connections to the lobbies, said Dave Yoder, director of Marlatt Hall and creator of MTV.

"I just dreamed it up and installed it," Yoder said. Marlatt is the only hall with this system.

Movies are shown on MTV Sunday and Wednesday nights. The MTV network includes a special television monitor located on the reception counter, said Mike Schroer, senior in electrical engineering and president of the Marlatt Hall Governing Board.

In addition, the monitor contains information on movies currently in Manhattan and on campus, sports events, community activities and hall news, Schroer said.

MTV makes it possible to efficiently present students with entertainment and hall promotions, Yoder said.

"Usually what we are trying to do is get across hall activities rather than the hall operations information," he said.

Each floor has its own movie nights. Hall promotions and entertainment such as David Letterman's Stupid Human Tricks are shown along with the movies, he said.

Skits and press conferences have been formats used to promote activities such as building the Homecoming float and hall parties.

Schroer said he introduced himself to the residents as president of HGB in the form of a presidential address on MTV.

One of Schroer's other presidential addresses took place before the movie "Animal House." He said he walked in front of the camera dressed in a toga and bow tie. He made a serious statement about the hall and then answered questions in a joking manner.

Promotional ideas usually come up at the spur of the moment, Schroer said, many times when HGB members are discussing an upcoming activity.

Some spots are live and others are taped. Yoder said he is trying to tape stupid roommate tricks, but he is having trouble finding people to do it.

"A lot of people will not get in front of the camera," he said.

Scripts used on MTV are written by hall residents. Yoder said he and Rick Darnell, junior in radio and television and Marlatt staff assistant, do the technical work.

Schroer said MTV is a fun way to get information across. Yoder agreed, saying the main focus is to entertain. He said he thinks residents have benefitted through increased awareness.

"I think all the halls should do it," said Scott Hammons, junior in history, because it gives students a chance to sit down with people on the floor who don't normally see each other.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

Friends and residents of fifth floor Marlatt Hall gather in the lobby last Wednesday to watch "Witness" on closed-circuit television. Marlatt Hall televises two movies on Wednesday and Sunday nights.

Greeks go 'hip' during week's activities

By KIM GREER
Collegian Reporter

This year's Greek Week has a new look, new activities and a theme that states, "It's Hip to be Greek."

Greek Week consists of daily events today through Saturday for several K-State fraternities and sororities. The Greek Week steering committee usually has a pamphlet containing composite photographs and party pictures, provided by participating greek organizations, printed to recognize the week, said Susan Rouse, sophomore in radio and television and Greek Week publicity coordinator. This year, committee members decided to print posters and T-shirts bearing the Greek Week logo instead.

Competition gains new look

Last year's "World Series" softball game will be replaced with a new event, "Lega Lega Lega." This three-legged kickball competition will begin at 4 p.m. today in Manhattan City Park. Finals will be at 6 p.m.

The Greek Week competition began Monday with the Greek Leadership Banquet featuring Terri Bullock, national president of Delta Upsilon, as the keynote speaker.

The greek honorary Order of Omega is sponsoring "Dunk-A-Greek," which will take place Wednesday behind the Union from 11:30 a.m. to 5 p.m. "Dunk-A-Greek" is open to anyone, and the cost is 50 cents for each throw.

Bushwacker's, 531 N. Manhattan Ave., will host the "Greek Newlywed Game" Thursday beginning at 8 p.m. Questions for "newlyweds" will be general, referring mainly to campus activities and sights.

"Aggie Days" will begin at 3 p.m. Friday with a dance marathon at Kite's Bar and Grille, 619 N. 12th St. A swing dance contest at The Dark Horse Tavern, 619 N. Manhattan Ave., will begin at 3:30 p.m. A pizza eating contest, sponsored by Pyramid Pizza, 707 N. 12th St., will follow at 4:30 p.m. at Brother's Tavern, 1120 Moro St. A lip sync contest at Rip & Mo's, 710 N. Manhattan Ave., is also scheduled to begin at 5 p.m. Friday. Winners for each "Aggie Days" event and the overall "Aggie Days" champion will be announced at Rip & Mo's at 6 p.m. Friday.

Greek Week will wind down with "Greek Follies" at 8 p.m. Saturday in McCain Auditorium. The winner of Greek Week will be announced following skits performed by each competing group and a slide show illustrating the theme, "It's Hip to be Greek." Tickets for the event will cost $3 at the door.

Coleman opts for NBA draft

By The Associated Press

MANHATTAN — High-scoring K-State forward Norris Coleman said Monday he will give up his senior year at the Big Eight school for an uncertain future in the NBA.

Coleman, an all-Big Eight selection the past two years, said he would apply for the June NBA draft.

"After weeks of long, hard thinking and exercising my options, I feel as though it is in my best interest to forego my senior year of eligibility and enter this year's NBA draft," Coleman said after telling Coach Lon Kruger of his decision.

"With those thoughts in mind and playing only 47 collegiate basketball games, I consider myself one of the most fortunate guys around. My intentions while at K-State were to contribute to the best of my ability towards the basketball program at this university, nothing more and nothing less."

Kruger, who led the Wildcats to a 20-11 record and the second round of the NCAA tournament in his first season as coach, issued a statement in which he thanked Coleman for his play. He declined to say anything further.

"I know I speak for all K-Staters in that we sincerely appreciate Norris' contributions to the university and our basketball program during the last two years," Kruger said. "I will support Norris in every way possible in his decision. We wish him the best of luck."

Coleman, who went to K-State after four years in the Army, played through controversy last season after the NCAA ruled that he did not make a high enough grade point average his senior year at Paxon Senior High School in Jacksonville, Fla.

The NCAA first ruled that Coleman would either have to sit out a year or transfer to another school to be eligible immediately. The NCAA later modified its ruling, requiring that Coleman sit out the first 12 games of the season.

Coleman, who was ineligible for the last two games of the 1985 season because of his high school GPA, was also required to repay his 1985 scholarship.

Returning this year for the first conference game, Coleman went on to lead the Wildcats in scoring with 20.7 points a game and finished his K-State career 15th on the scoring list with 1,003 points. He averaged 8.4 rebounds a game.

Coleman started the second game for which he was eligible and then every game after that until the last regular-season game against Oklahoma. He also played off the bench in the Big Eight post-season tournament and in the Wildcats' two-game appearance in the NCAA tournament.

Coleman will turn 26 in September, but he said his age was not the deciding factor.

"My age was a factor, but it definitely was not the reason," he said. "I took all things into perspective and decided what would be best for myself."

Pro scouts have said Coleman may not have the size, ball-handling ability and passing ability to be successful in the NBA.

"There are areas that I have to improve, ball handling, but everybody knows that a player always has to improve the facets of his game," said Coleman.

Norris Coleman announced Monday he will forego his final season of basketball eligibility at K-State to apply for the NBA draft.

Call earns tryout with U.S. squad

K-State volleyball standout Shawnee Call is one of 30 athletes selected to try out for the U.S. team that will compete in the World University Games.

"That's the first time we've had such an athlete recognized that highly," said K-State Coach Scott Nelson. "It's a great honor to be invited to such a tryout."

Call, a sophomore from Ellsworth, will try out May 1-2 at the U.S. Olympic Training Center in San Diego. Fifteen athletes will be chosen for the traveling team which will compete July 6-17 in Zagreb, Yugoslavia.

Last season Call was named to the All-Midwest region team by the Collegiate Volleyball Coaches Association and was tabbed a first team All-Big Eight choice.

Women's golf team nabs early lead

Paced by Erin Andrew's tournament-leading round of 41, the K-State women's golf team vaulted to an eight-stroke lead after Monday's opening round of the Southwest Missouri State Golf Invitational in Springfield, Mo.

After the first round was shortened to nine holes due to cold weather, K-State had claimed four of the top six individual scores on the par-71, 5,962-yard Greene Hills Country Club course.

Jill Zientara was tied for second at 41 while Paige Harrison and Sheely Sherman each carded 43s to tie for fifth.

Trailing K-State are Southwest Missouri State (177), Northeast Missouri State (186), Mankato State (187) and Stevens College (202). The final 18-hole round begins at 10 a.m. today.

Royals announce special events

The second induction to the Royals' Hall of Fame and the second-annual Equitable Assurance Old Timers Game highlight the Kansas City Royals' 1987 calendar of special events.

A total of 14 events are being planned for the 1987 campaign. The second Royals' Hall of Fame Day will occur May 30. Two former Royals' players will join Steve Busby and Amos Otis who were the hall of fame's innagural inductees in 1986.

The Old-Timers Game is scheduled for Aug. 1. A collection of former Royals will battle a team of ex-major leaguers who will compose the Equitable squad.

Indiana nabs NCAA crown as Smart nails game winner

By The Associated Press

NEW ORLEANS — Indiana Coach Bob Knight changed with the times, got smart — Keith Smart, that is — and won a national championship for the ages.

Smart, a 6-foot-1 guard and one of Knight's first junior college transfers, hit a 16-foot baseline jumper with five seconds left Monday night to give the third-ranked Hoosiers a 74-73 victory over No. 10 Syracuse.

It was Indiana's fifth national title and the third for Knight, a total surpassed only by coaching legends John Wooden at UCLA, who had 10, and Adolph Rupp at Kentucky, who had four.

It wouldn't have happened, though, had Knight not changed his ways before this season.

First, he started recruiting junior college players, including Smart and center Dean Garrett. Smart scored 21 against Syracuse, 17 in the second half, and was named the most outstanding player in the Final Four. Garrett had 10 points and 10 rebounds.

Then, Knight changed his mind about suspending Daryl Thomas before the season, and Thomas scored 20 in the championship game.

Finally, just two days after complaining loudly that the new 3-point shot was bad for basketball, Knight turned All-America guard Steve Alford loose to shoot it.

Alford responded with 23 points, all but two on "3s."

"Sooner or later, he's going to get you there," Alford said in tribute to his coach.

The winning shot was supposed to be Alford's as well, but when he was covered, Thomas found Smart and Smart found the range.

"We worked it around and I knew time was running out, so I just took the shot," said Smart.

Smart grabbed the rebound of Howard Triche's miss and drove for a goal to cut the Orangemen's lead to 73-72.

Syracuse had its chances, but Triche missed the second of two free throws with 38 seconds left and Derrick Coleman missed a 1-and-1 with 28 seconds remaining.

As time ran out, Smart intercepted Coleman's floor-length desperation pass.

Knight, who won championships in 1976 and 1981, finished the season at 30-4. His Hoosiers shared the Big Ten title with Purdue.

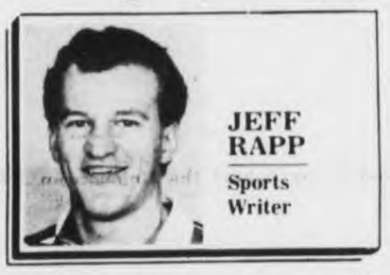
Syracuse, which shared the Big East title with Pittsburgh and Georgetown, got 20 points from point guard Sherman Douglas, 18 from center Rony Seikaly and 12 from guard Greg Monroe.

Coleman, a 6-foot-9 freshman, grabbed 19 rebounds, two short of the tournament record set by Bill Spivey in Kentucky's championship win over Kansas State in 1951.

Indiana trailed most of the first half, but two straight 3-pointers by Alford put them in the locker room at halftime with a 34-33 lead.

Indiana took a 41-37 lead in the second half, but Syracuse outscored the Hoosiers 15-3, with reserve Derek Brower contributing five points and Seikaly four points for a 52-44 lead.

The Hoosiers bounced back with a 10-0 run as reserve Joe Hillman made two steals and Garrett blocked shots by Seikaly and Coleman. Smart's jumper capped the run for a 54-52 Indiana lead.



Syracuse came back with seven straight points, the last on Douglas' 3-pointer.

Indiana came back to tie it at 61 on a basket by Smart.

Triche then made a goal with 56 seconds remaining for a 72-70 Syracuse lead.

One has to experience rugby to realize why players love it

JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

Why they subject themselves to such unnecessary punishment will always be a mystery to me.

They play full-contact football without protective padding. They pay their own way when the team goes on the road and they seem to love it.

They, in this case, are the K-State rugby team.

For a typical sports writer, I've spent a fair amount of time covering rugby matches. I've covered several matches in Manhattan and took a road trip to Lawrence with the team last semester to watch them defeat Kansas.

By spending time with the squad, it didn't take me long to realize rugby is more than just a game and what happens after the game is just as important as the game itself.

Let me preface this description of the team with this statement: K-State rugby players are some of the craziest, wildest, most intense people I've ever run across while covering sports.

Different players at different times roll out of bed and for some reason anxiously await possibly sustaining a concussion, an abrasion or a broken bone. The thought of winning dashes through their minds, as does the thought of the party after the game. (The party is just as wild regardless of the winning team, because both teams are invited.)

Around noon, K-State's players start putting on their red and black uniforms to get prepared for the game.

Red and black? Yes, the rugby team wears red and black, not the traditional purple and white. This is because the team was originally a Fort Riley-K-State team. The colors haven't been switched partly because of a lack of funding from the University and largely because the team's primary sponsor is a local beer distributorship.

After much anticipation, ruggers take their girlfriends, wives or even dogs to the game. They don't really expect much cheering from the crowd, because games are more like a family reunion.

I've heard more than once the expression "rugby widow," which is the mate of a rugby player who never sees him because he's so occupied with the game.

As the afternoon progresses, the actual game is played between two teams who cuss, shout at and physically abuse each other, yet almost always share a mutual respect. This unspoken respect reflects an attitude of admiration between rugby players around the world. Players realize they're a rare breed and that they should stick together.

After the game this camarraderie is demonstrated by the traditional "host-team beer bust." This is where the truly wacky traditions of the K-State rugby team take place.

For instance, if during the day's game a player scored his first try ever, he is expected that night to perform a "Zulu." This is somewhat of a victory dance that consists of keeping a beer balanced on one's head while stripping to the buff while the team sings along boisterously and throws additional beer on the honoree.

The whole point of the evening's activities seems to be, "If we're crazy enough to play rugby, we're crazy enough to do anything."

Overall, my aim is to say rugby is not just a sport that guys get together on Saturday to play. Between practices, games, host-parties and tournaments, those almost-suicidal nuts who play the game are one big family.

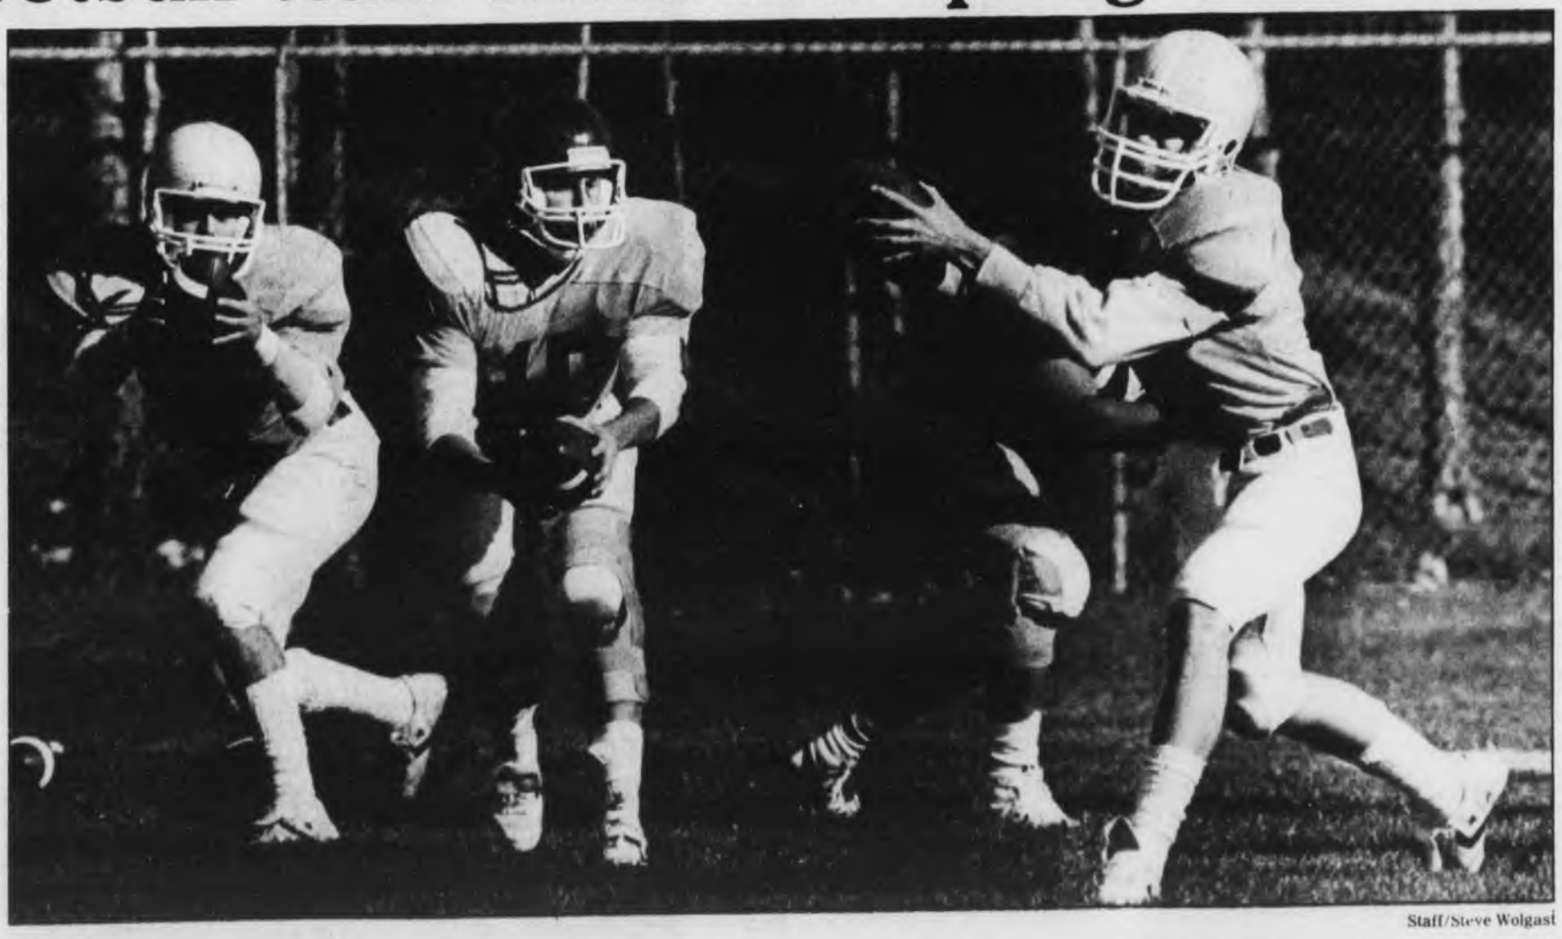
K-State football team holds first spring workout

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

In weather Coach Stan Parrish described as "cool and brisk," K-State's football team held its first workout of the spring Monday.

The two-hour practice consisted of stretching, position drills, and, for about the last 15 minutes of the session, full-contact scrimmaging.

"We got a lot covered for the first day," Parrish said. "There was real good enthusiasm and good hitting."



"I think we've really improved — especially strengthwise and speedwise," said John Williams, a 6-foot-0, 185-pound senior wide receiver.

Williams and Gary Swim, a 6-3, 195-pound quarterback who transferred to K-State from Snow Community College, stayed after practice to work on timing.

Parrish said there were no surprises in the practice, but that he would have to look at the film of the session to better evaluate the workout.

He said everyone who was expected reported for practice; 1986 Wildcats who did not return to the team are wide receivers Mark Wentzel and Todd Elder, defensive back Chris Smith and defensive tackle Roderick Stansell.

Players who will miss all of the 1987 season are linebacker Dwayne Castille and defensive back Andy Schrag. Both are recovering from injuries.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

In less than spring-like weather Monday, the Wildcat football team held its first spring practice. In addition to stretching and a scrimmage, quarterbacks practiced handoffs as part of their initial drills. "There was real good enthusiasm and good hitting," head coach Stan Parrish said.

Kansas City makes trade with Cubs

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Kansas City Royals traded Jim Sundberg, their starting catcher the past two seasons, to the Chicago Cubs on Monday for pinch-hitting outfielder Thad Bosley and middle reliever Dave Gumpert.

The trade hands the catching job to Ed Hearn, who was acquired from the New York Mets last Thursday for pitcher David Cone, one of the Royals' brightest pitching prospects.

Sundberg came to the Royals in a trade with Milwaukee Jan. 18, 1985 for catcher Don Slaught and pitcher Frank Wills. He batted .245 with 10 homers and 35 RBI that year as the Royals won the American League pennant and the World Series.

Bosley, 30, hit .275 in 87 games with Chicago last season as a reserve outfielder. He broke into the majors with California and spent time with the Chicago White Sox, Milwaukee and Seattle before joining the Cubs in 1983.

Agronomy professor, author dies of cancer

By The Collegian Staff

Mark Hooker, 40, associate professor of agronomy, died of cancer Thursday at St. Catherine Hospital in Garden City.

Funeral arrangements for Hooker, who was a soil fertility agronomist with the Southwest Kansas Branch Agricultural Experiment Station in Garden City, are still pending.

He is survived by his wife, Maureen, and two daughters, Kolette and Kami. Hooker was a resident of Garden City.

He was born January 23, 1947, in Chadron, Neb. He attended the University of Nebraska where he received a bachelor's degree in range management. He also received a master's degree and a doctorate, both in soil fertility from the University of Nebraska. In addition, he did graduate work at Iowa State University.

Before joining the agricultural experiment station in 1979, Hooker was a research assistant in agronomy at the University of Nebraska. His major concentration in research was in soil fertility and fertilizer management, and in evaluating techniques for improved management of irrigation water. His expertise was in surge irrigation — especially toward its development in western Kansas.

Hooker was associate editor and technical editor of the Journal of Agronomy, one of the most prestigious agricultural professional journals. A member of the American Society of Agronomy and the Soil Science Society, Hooker was also the author of several articles in other scientific publications.

"He was a very well-trained, ongoing scientist who had very strong professional ties," said George Ham, professor and head of the Department of Agronomy. "(Hooker) had developed good relations with farmers in southwestern Kansas."

Videos highlight Pro-Choice Week

By TED MCFEETERS
Collegian Reporter

Abortion in contemporary American society is the topic of Pro-Choice Week, today through Friday.

Jointly sponsored by the Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women and the Women's Resource Center, events throughout the week will include several videos, discussions and guest speakers.

"A lot of people believe a woman has the right to choice" where abortion is concerned, said Phyllis Wisneski, president of Manhattan NOW.

"It's her life that will be impacted on, and the government should not be able to make that choice for her," she said.

Wisneski said people are wanting to discuss pro-choice, and the two organizations are giving them the chance by sponsoring these activities.

The video "Holy Terror," a documentary on abortion clinic violence, will be shown at noon today in the Little Theatre followed by a discussion led by Sandra Barnett, member of Manhattan NOW.

At 7:30 p.m. in Union 213, Teresa Shively, National Abortion Rights Action League, and Darlene Stearns, Kansas Religious Coalition for Abortion Rights, will speak on the historical aspects of the abortion issue in the United States and Kansas.

Wednesday will feature the video "Silent Scream" in the Little Theatre at noon and Union 208 at 7 p.m. Susan Minick, member of Manhattan NOW, will lead a pro-choice rebuttal and discussion at noon, while Cherie Fraine will lead the evening discussion.

Guest speaker Adelle Hughey, Comprehensive Health Services of Kansas City, will talk about harassment of women's health clinics and the services available at such clinics at noon Thursday in Union 213.

In addition, the film "Holy Terror" will be shown one last time at 7 p.m. in Eisenhower 20. Following the film, Wisneski and Doug Schmidt, graduate student in entomology and member of Manhattan NOW, will lead a discussion.

Throughout the week, the organizations are sponsoring an informational table in the Union.

To begin the week's events, there was a panel discussion Monday.

Singer's style should appease all audiences

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

Three years ago, when the hard-hitting R & B group Shalamar broke up, it was no secret which way the three would go.

Review

Co-founder and former Soul Train dancer, Jeffrey Daniels, went back to choreographing; Jody Watley returned to modeling, and lead-singer/songwriter Howard Hewett, stayed solo.

Now after recording "Dancing in the Sheets," ("Footloose") and "Don't Get Stopped in Beverly Hills," ("Beverly Hills Cop") Howard Hewett has finally cut a solo LP.

Next to Luther Vandross and Patti Austin, Hewett has always been one of the most underrated talents in the music scene. His new LP, "I Commit To Love," should do something about that.

Not sticking with just one producer on this album, Hewett works with three — George Duke, Leon Sylvers III and Stanley Clarke. Background vocals were also pitched in by the likes of Ross Vanelli and Deniece Williams. Most of the songs are co-written by Hewett and range from techno-pop to gospel.

While Luther Vandross always sings about finding love, and Steve Perry sings about losing it, Hewett, however, has always sung about the ups and downs in between. And just as in his Shalamar days, his voice and lyrics still convey that hard-core romanticism that has always been his trademark. This album has more feeling and texture than all of his earlier works.

The first cut (and second single) "Stay" is the slow-fast number where he warns a lover that if she leaves, something more stays behind. Then he reaffirms his feelings with passionate clarity in "I'm For Real" and later hits with high tech sound in "Crazy 'Bout You."

Side two heats up with the best tracks on the album. The songs run the gamut about the realities of relationships.

"Love Don't Wanna Wait" is up tempo and full of Sylvers' bass thumping away and synthesizers flaring.

True to form, the best cuts on the album are ballads. The title track, "I Commit To Love," has a smoldering attitude to it, and Hewett's voice weaves nicely with the melody.

"Let's Try It All Over Again" is typically hopeful for Hewett. He doesn't walk away from his lovers; he always tries to work things out. He doesn't skimp on power or crooning and his falsetto style on the end of the song would easily make any DeBarge turn green.

"Say Amen" is a pop-flavored spiritual and, surprisingly, was also written by Hewett and sung just as well as his R & B counterparts. Unlike Lionel Richie, who always has one country tune on each LP, Hewett might well consider using spirituals on the rest of his albums.

With pipes on par with Jeffrey Osbourne and Freddie Jackson, Hewett needs little packaging to sell his product.

He's led a successful R & B group; he's got the looks and style to appease all types of audiences and the writing and vocal abilities to keep churning out quality material. His acclaim is long overdue, and so is this album.

New York company to sing Italian opera with subtitles

By The Collegian Staff

Returning for the fourth consecutive season, the New York City Opera's National Company will present Giacomo Puccini's "Madama Butterfly" at 8 p.m. Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

The opera is sung in Italian but will have English subtitles on a big screen above the stage during the performance. The New York City Opera is one of the first companies in the United States to use a subtitle screen.

"The translations make the opera more accessible to the audience. It also helps the audience in understanding what the opera is all about," said Stephen Riggs, director of McCain Auditorium.

The New York City Opera National Company consists of young Americans traveling with a 30-piece orchestra and an entourage of young singers and a stage full of elaborate costumes and sets.

"Madama Butterfly" is a love story. The main character, Cio-Cio San, a shy Japanese child of 15, renounces family and religion to become the bride of American Lieutenant Benjamin Franklin Pinkerton. She becomes known to everyone as "Madama Butterfly."

Cio-Cio clings stubbornly to her faith in Pinkerton when he leaves for three years, only to find that he has taken an American woman as his "real" wife. Shunned by her people, rejected by her husband, she follows the only path of honor left open to her: death.

Operas draw a large audience to McCain, Riggs said, including students and the Manhattan community. He said performance provides a great opportunity to see a premier opera company perform "literally in your backyard."

Lower level seating was nearly sold out by Thursday. Tickets available at the McCain box office are $18-$23 for general admission and $14-$18 for students.

ads in the Chronicle of Higher Education and a leading journal for black administrators, she said.

The Chronicle is a major source of ads for jobs like these, Flora said. But the committee wanted minority applicants, so it advertised in the other journal, she said.

From a field of 120 nominations, Flora said the committee received 80 applications.

After reviewing the applicants' statements of goals and experience, the committee made two cuts, she said. Through teleconferencing, committee members, in groups of two or three, then interviewed the candidates' references by using a questionnaire based on the criteria, Flora said.

Afterwards, committee members talked to people who knew the candidates but were not listed as references, she said.

"The higher up you get up in the administration, the more flexible the criteria gets," Flora said.

"We simply said, 'Who looks best?'" at the conclusion of the interviewing process, she said.

Every committee member agreed on the final four applicants, Flora said.

If the commission rejects the report, Peery said, the compact will fall back to an earlier Dames and Moore study. In the first study, 10,496 square miles in Kansas and 25,998 in the five states were targeted for possible sites. The first study did not list specific sites.

The studies were to be used by a private developer to select a site and build a dump, although the developer could select an area not considered in a study.

Peery said the commission would receive bids for building a disposal facility by Wednesday. He said he knew of two companies submitting bids: U.S. Ecology, of Louisville, Ky., and Westinghouse Electric Corp., of Pittsburgh.

Peery noted the processes for selecting a site and developer were separate. The host state will be chosen prior to the naming of a developer and that state likely will have veto power over the developer. The developer would have to go through the state's licensing process.

"Once we select a developer, the process has been it also goes to the state," Peery said.

said that although there is no formal AIDS education for elementary students, the nurses and teachers do their best to answer any questions the students may ask.

"If students ask questions, we try to answer them as simply as possible," she said. "But accurate information seems to change daily."

Surgeon General C. Everett Koop's remarks concerning AIDS are "very powerful," Hawk said. Koop advocates the use of condoms as a preventive measure against the AIDS virus.

"We need information to give to the students," he said. "We (the school system) need to develop an open, honest dialogue with the students. We need to communicate with the kids as they grow up. I know I'm concerned as an educator and as a parent. I've warned my kids about AIDS as best I can."

What independent suspension does for your BMW, Kaepa does for your foot.

If you look at the photo closely, you'll see that the Kaepa shoe's upper is actually two independently moving parts. Each part is secured to your foot by a separate lace.

This solves the problem of conventional athletic shoes, which may fit perfectly when you're standing still, but distort when your foot flexes, pinching down at the top of your foot and bulging out at the heel.

When you move your foot, Kaepa's two parts move like a body joint, smoothly mimicking your foot's flexing action.

The result is quicker, easier, more precise footwork. And comfort that doesn't stop when you start moving.

So whatever your sport is, there's a Kaepa that'll give you a $30,000 ride.

Instructor relates dangers of misunderstanding democracy

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

People who want to expand the role of the democratic decision-making process are in great error because they do not understand the dangers, said Roger Trenary, instructor in economics.

Trenary explained what he believes are the dangers and errors of democracy Tuesday night in the Union Little Theatre as part of the Last Lecture Series.

"The first error people make is in assuming that the founders of democracy saw it as ideal," he said.

In reality, the founders had very little faith in democracy, Trenary said. For example, the electoral college was established so the president would not be elected by the people. Also, the Bill of Rights places limitations on the government.

"These limitations were not enacted because the forefathers didn't have faith in the government; they didn't have faith in the people.

The second error people make is a failure to recognize that democratic decision making is just an either/or choice.

For example, in an election, voters are forced to choose between two people, neither of whom necessarily reflect the voters' opinions, Trenary said.

In a marketplace, on the other hand, majorities and minorities can have their own choice.

"If a grocery store were run the same way as a democracy, the store managers would just make up two or three bundles of what an average person buys," he said. "I would have to choose from one of those big bundles instead of picking out all my groceries myself."

In a democracy, the option a voter picks is not necessarily the option he gets, which make the final decisions less likely to reflect the people's choices.

For example, the safety air bags designed to be installed in automobile dashes is being discussed in government as a requirement for all new automobiles. However, this act would not reflect the opinion of all people.

"Why should I have to spend $800 to have a balloon blow up in my face, since I am responsible enough to wear my lap belts on my own?" he asked.

The number of people involved in the electoral process makes one person's vote have very influential in the final outcome.

"In any given election, one voter has little influence as to the final decision made," he said.

For this reason, voters have little incentive to know what is going on.

When decisions are made in a marketplace, however, informed and educated people benefit.

"We know we have influence on what kind of toothpaste we buy, but not over who represents us," he said. "So we don't bother to learn about (our representatives)."

A third error often made is the assumption that people in voting booths behave differently than they do in the marketplace.

"People in the marketplace are usually out for their own self-interest, but the outcomes in voting booths are assumed to be noble and in the nation's best interest," he said.

In reality, he said, people vote for various things to protect their own self-interest.

"College students don't appeal for money saying they need it for better clothes or to go to Florida over spring break, they appeal for money saying they need it for their education," he said.

Although Trenary said he is not suggesting the nation eliminate democracy, he said people should be careful about expanding its role in society.

"Democratic decision making is not the ideal, (but) it is the least bad of other alternatives," he said.

Abortion bill passes in Senate

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate passed and returned to the House Tuesday a bill which requires pregnant girls under age 16 to have written consent of their parents or a district judge before they can obtain an abortion.

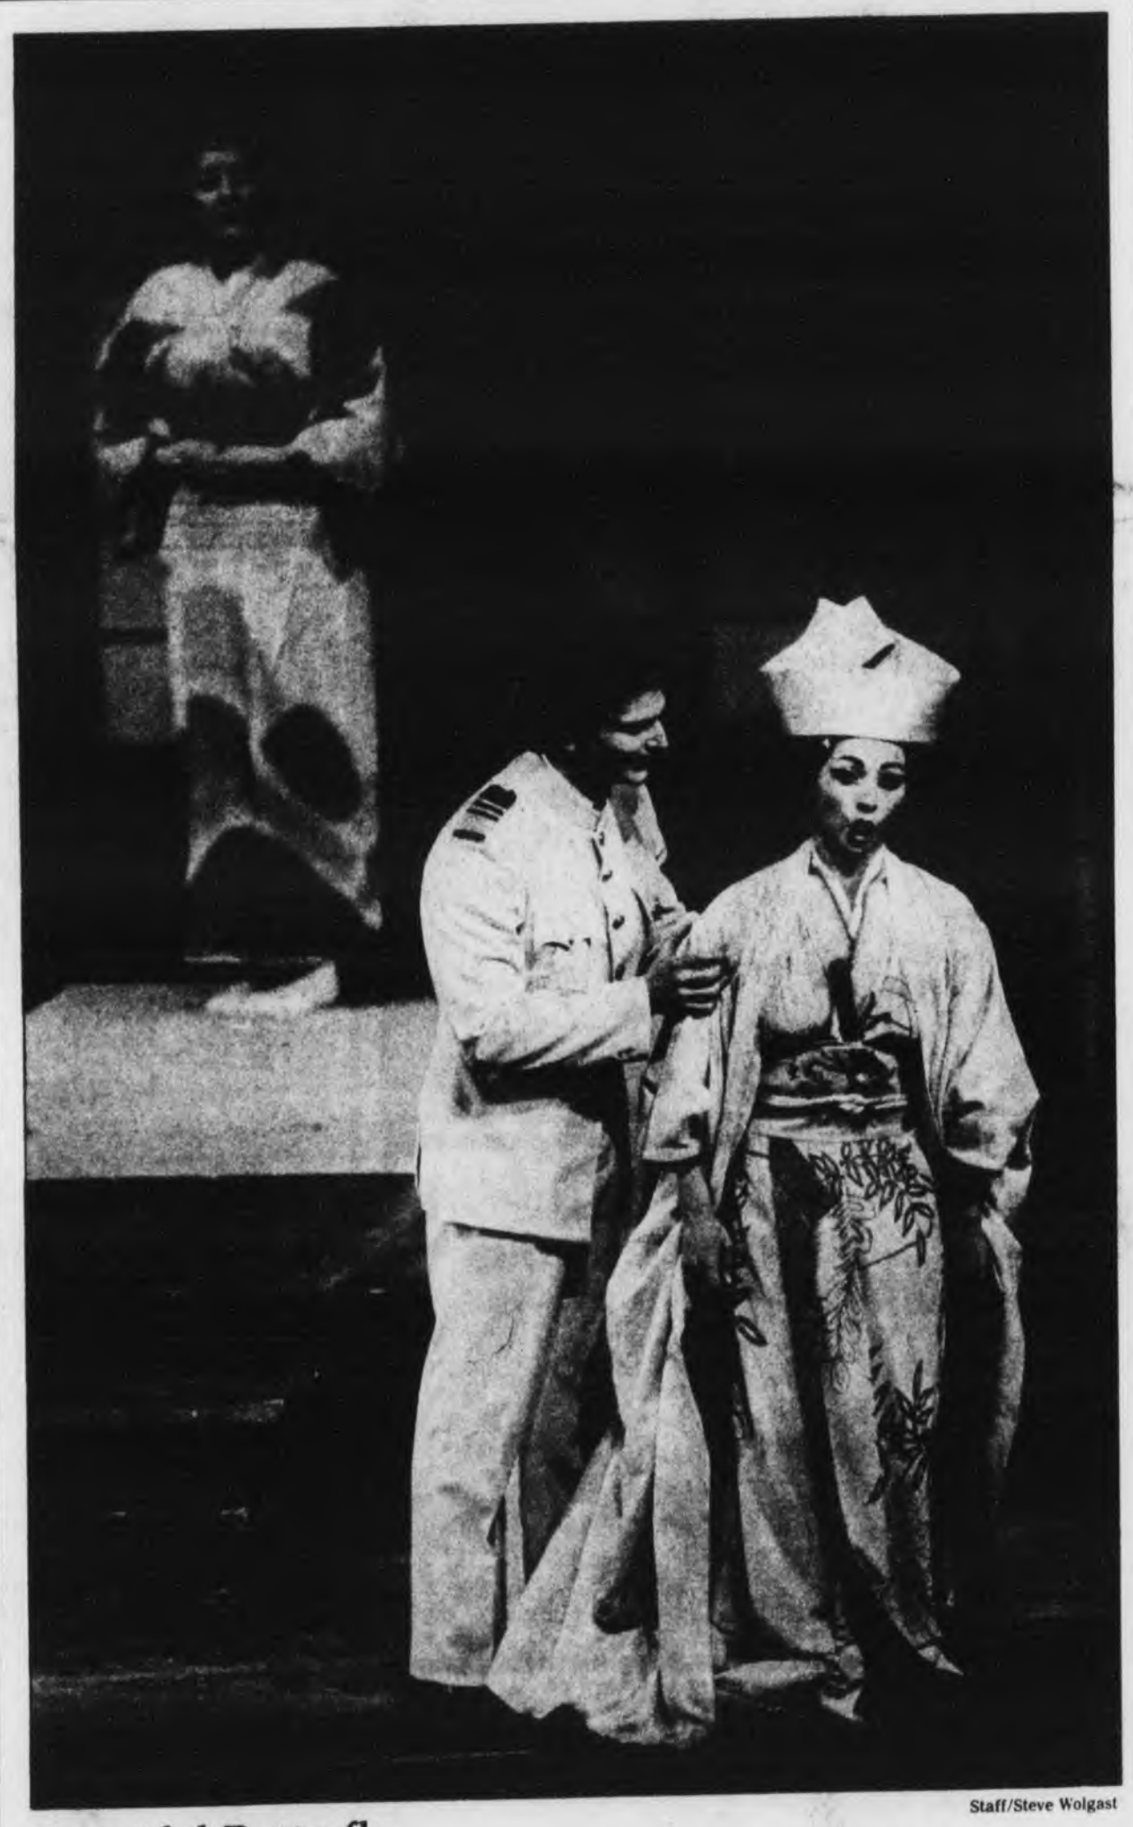
The parental consent mandate was added to a bill which makes it a crime to encourage children to run away from home or to hide runaway children. The bill passed 36-4 and now returns to the House for consideration of Senate amendments.

Sen. Frank Gaines, D-Augusta, proposed the parental consent amendment, saying no other medical procedure is performed on children without written consent of their parents or guardians.

Sen. Robert Frey, R-Liberal, opposed the amendment, saying Gaines and parental consent supporters were out of touch with the real world. Sen. Bill Morris, R-Wichita, opposed it because he said it was wrong for lawmakers to try to force good family relationships by passing laws.

Sen. Alicia Salisbury, R-Topeka, voted in favor of the bill, but expressed deep concern at the Senate's refusal to mandate all Kansas schools to teach sex education to all students, kindergarten through senior high.

"I support the concept of parental consent for a minor to receive an abortion," Salisbury said. "However, I am concerned that the Legislature seemingly is unwilling to address the reason to be concerned about teen-age abortion — that being teen-age pregnancy."



"Teen-age pregnancy is a matter of increasing concern to many Kansans. Teen-age pregnancy — the problem nobody wants — is not going away with adoption of a parental consent measure. Nor will it, unless there is heightened awareness and commitment and a willingness to go beyond simplistic approaches."

Her remarks follow action Monday by the upper chamber rejecting a proposal to mandate sex education in Kansas schools.

In other action Tuesday, the Senate passed bills which would:

— Impose a state tax on marijuana and controlled substances. The bill, which passed 40-0, returns to the House for consideration of Senate changes.

It calls for a tax of $3.50 for each gram of marijuana, $200 for each gram of a controlled substance and $2,000 for each 50 units of a controlled substance not sold by weight.

Elderly to instruct by telling of past, 'when I was young'

By The Collegian Staff

Most grandparents enjoy reminiscing about the "good old days." Usually the only audience for these period reflections is the family.

But a new program could transform these tale tellers of yesteryear into living historians in secondary school classrooms.

To help children learn more about the past, the Riley County Retired Senior Volunteers Program and the student gerontology club is starting a new program utilizing senior citizens to recount their firsthand experiences to students.

"This is the way it was when I was young," is the main idea behind the program, said Ann Daniels, graduate student in human development and family studies, specializing in life-span human development.

Daniels said the program idea came from a successful "Living Historian" program in effect for five years in the Johnson County area.

Daniels said the Johnson County progam includes the elementary levels and is beginning to expand into the middle schools and high schools. Riley County RSVP plans to start its program in the elementary schools as well, she said.

"The children have been real responsive to the volunteers in the Johnson County area," Daniels said.

Working with the program will help members of the student gerontology club in their education and training, she said. Members also wanted to minimize the age difference between themselves and senior citizens by establishing an interage mix.

One benefit of the program's organization is senior citizen volunteers coordinate their presentations through the school system, Daniels said.

Volunteers in Johnson County talk about more social sciences, "something out of their own direct past," Daniels said.

The school board and the teacher whose class will hear a specific topic must approve the topics before volunteers can give classroom presentations.

Daniels said one benefit of working with the school system is that teachers can ask the RSVP program for help if they want a volunteer to speak about a specific topic.

"(The program) deals with real issues, and (teachers) may request an RSVP volunteer to come and talk about that subject," she said.

Before the speaker comes to the classroom, the students usually study the speaker's topic for two weeks, Daniels said. When the volunteer relates his or her personal experience to the children, they can ask questions.

Due to the ban on prayer and teaching religion in public schools, Daniels said, the only restriction on presentation content is that volunteers cannot mention religion.

At the conclusion of their presentation, Daniels said volunteers encourage the children to go home and talk to their grandparents about their experience during that time period.

Senior citizen volunteers come from a variety of backgrounds, she said. They must be 60 years or older and meet certain qualifications.

'(The program) deals with real issues, and (teachers) may request an RSVP volunteer to come and talk about that subject.'
— Ann Daniels

People interested in participating in the program must go through a training program before they give any presentations to students.

"They are often given telephone interviews, and if the group is interested, they ask them to come for a personal interview," Daniels said.

As part of the qualifications, senior citizens must have their own means of transportation, and be able to speak well and hold the attention of the children, she said.

To keep the children interested in the presentation, many volunteers use pictures and diagrams, Daniels said.

The group of volunteers is not yet large enough in Riley County, Daniels said, but they hope to expand soon and involve other communities and school districts.

Daniels said members of the U.S.D. 383 School Board and teachers attending the first meeting Monday were excited about the program.

"They showed great support and seem to enjoy it very much," she said.

Judge awards Baby M to father in disputed surrogate case

By The Associated Press

HACKENSACK, N.J. — A judge awarded custody of Baby M to her father Tuesday, stripped surrogate mother Mary Beth Whitehead of all parental rights and upheld the $10,000 contract under which she agreed to give up the child.

In the nation's first judicial ruling on a disputed surrogate contract, Bergen County Superior Court Judge Harvey R. Sorkow said the contract was valid because just as men have a constitutional right to sell their sperm, women can decide what to do with their wombs.

Immediately after William Stern won custody in the landmark case, his wife, Elizabeth, adopted the year-old baby, whom they call Melissa. The child has been in their care while the case was argued.

Whitehead, who had vowed to appeal, was at home when the ruling came. Earlier, she had visited with the baby and then stopped at a church to light a devotional candle.

She made no statement after the ruling was announced, but her attorneys filed for a stay of the decision pending an appeal to the state Supreme Court and for an order continuing her visitation rights.

"If the courts are going to uphold those kinds of contracts, they are basically degrading our society," said Whitehead's attorney, Randolph Wolf.

"I have a tingling feeling in my elbows, I'm so happy," Stern said as he embraced his tearful wife after they listened to the judge read his 2½-hour-long decision in the crowded, locked courtroom.

Elizabeth Stern said she had "empathy" for Whitehead. "Despite all the bad feelings that have gone on, on both sides, she gave us a beautiful daughter," she said.

"If she wants to be with Mary Beth, we'll do everything to help her be with Mary Beth," she said.

In Florida, the baby's maternal grandmother said she found the decision hard to believe and said her family doesn't think the battle is over.

"It's devastating. I can't believe it. Justice has not been done," said Catherine "Eileen" Messer from her retirement home in Holiday, Fla.

Sorkow made no provision for Whitehead ever to see the child, but he ordered Stern to pay her the $10,000 agreed to in the contract. That money had been held in escrow since the contract was signed.

Sorkow said the Sterns had shown a stable, secure, loving relationship, the ability to provide financially and psychologically for the future needs of the baby and "an ability to make rational decisions in the most trying of circumstances."

Sorkow also said the Sterns would better be able to explain to the child her unusual beginnings.

Tax may further anti-U.S. feelings

TOKYO — Anti-American sentiment among Japanese citizens will grow if the United States goes ahead with penalty duties on up to $300 million worth of Japanese electronic goods, a senior government official said Tuesday.

"The atmosphere in Japan against the Americans would become — not so good. They would think the U.S. was emotional and illogical," said Noburo Hatakeyama, director general of the International Trade Administration Bureau.

Hatakeyama repeated warnings from other Japanese officials that Japan would consider retaliation if its negotiators cannot dissuade the United States from going ahead with the penalty duties. But he did not offer any details on what form the retaliation might take.

"We might get tough. What is important is to ask them to withdraw the duties and ask them to understand the true situation. And we can retaliate after that," if necessary, he told a group of foreign journalists.

Although Japan is striving to cut its huge trade surplus, it cannot make any concessions on semiconductor trade to fend off the planned U.S. penalty duties because it is doing nothing wrong, Hatakeyama said.

"If we offer any concessions, then that suggests we acknowledge having violated the agreement," he said. "But in this case we've done nothing wrong, so there is nothing we can concede."

Captors renew hostage swap offer

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Moslem kidnappers today renewed an offer to swap four hostages for 400 Arabs held by Israel, and claimed that the health of one captive American was "deteriorating day by day."

The demand came in a handwritten Arabic statement signed by the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine and delivered to offices of the Beirut newspaper An-Nahar.

The statement said the health of American hostage Alann Steen, 47, of Boston, was "deteriorating day by day despite continuous medication." It called him "a spy."

The statement was accompanied by a photograph of one of the four hostages, Jesse Turner, 39, of Boise, Idaho. Three Americans — Turner, Steen and Robert Polhill, 53, of New York City — and an Indian, Mithileshwar Singh, were kidnapped from Beirut University College on Jan. 24.

Nuclear operators caught sleeping

WASHINGTON — Pennsylvania's big Peach Bottom nuclear plant was ordered shut down Tuesday by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission, which said it found control room operators sleeping on duty.

While plants have been shut down before, NRC spokesman Joe Fouchard said "this is the first time we've taken an action as the result of information of this type."

Sen. John Heinz, R-Pa., called the action "a wakeup call for the nuclear industry."

The NRC said it learned just a week ago about "pervasive" on-the-job sleeping at the plant.

The plant, owned by Philadelphia Electric Corp., began "an orderly shutdown" Tuesday morning, Fouchard said.

"They may not restart without our approval. These are very serious matters and we plan to probe them thoroughly," he said.

The plant is capable of producing one million killowatts of electric power — more than most in the United States. The utility said costs can be expected to rise because it will have to buy replacement power.

Senate to debate death penalty bill

TOPEKA — A controversial bill that would reinstate capital punishment in Kansas narrowly escaped a Senate committee Tuesday and advanced to the full Senate, where the measure faces an uncertain future.

As expected, the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee did not endorse the bill. However, the panel did advance the bill without recommendation. Senate leaders said they expect the upper chamber to debate the bill Friday, but they wouldn't predict how the vote would go.

"I don't know how many votes it's got," said Senate Majority Leader Bud Burke, R-Leawood. "I'm not terribly supportive of it. I just want to get it up and disposed of. We want to get it behind us and get on to other things that need to be done."

Senate President Robert V. Talkington, R-Iola, also predicted a close vote.

"We probably won't know until we vote on it," Talkington said.

Gov. Mike Hayden, who made restoration of the death penalty a cornerstone of his campaign for office last fall, remains confident he will sign a death penalty bill according to Kathy Peterson, his press secretary.

"He's talking to people, but he's not twisting arms," Peterson said. "He's met with people today."

The bill makes death by lethal injection as a possible punishment in cases of aggravated murder — those murders which are premediated, deliberate or committed in conjunction with the crimes of aggravated kidnapping, rape or aggravated criminal sodomy.

Speed limit bill may not be needed

TOPEKA — After a hearing Tuesday on a bill that would raise the speed limit on Kansas rural interstate highways to 65 mph, the chairman of the House Transportation Committee said the measure may not be needed to accomplish that goal.

Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton, made the remark after hearing testimony that the state secretary of transportation already has the power to raise the 55 mph speed limit to whatever level Congress allows, 60 days after federal legislation goes into effect with consent of the governor.

Since Gov. Mike Hayden supports increasing the speed limit on rural interstates, the only advantage the state would gain by passing the bill would be to eliminate the 60-day delay, Crowell said.

However, he said he believes the Kansas Department of Transportation would need some time to react to the speed limit increase anyway.

Education system study proposed

TOPEKA — Two senators proposed Tuesday that the Legislature commission a study of the state's primary and secondary education systems to find ways to improve them.

Sens. Joe Harder, R-Moundridge, and Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, said they favored a study over a House-passed bill that would revamp the governance of higher education in Kansas by giving the state Board of Regents supervision of community colleges. Harder is chairman of the Senate Education Committee.

Harder's committee is scheduled to debate and take action on a proposal to set up a task force and hire a consultant to consider changes in the education section of the Kansas Constitution after the 1987 Legislature adjourns.

"We have to do something for higher education," Kerr said. "We seem to have trouble getting a proposal that will have unified support."

Harder said he did not intend to kill the governance bill.

"We need to dicuss the options," Harder said.

Local NOW hears pro-choice speaker

By The Collegian Staff

Proposed legislation limiting abortion rights was discussed Tuesday night at a meeting sponsored by the Manhattan chapter of the National Organization for Women.

Theresa Shively, executive director of the pro-choice Kansas National Abortion Rights Action League, was on hand to speak about her organization and its stance against the bills which are now in the Kansas Legislature.

The three bills NARAL and NOW oppose are aimed at limiting the rights pregnant women now have under the Roe vs. Wade decision of 1973. Under Roe vs. Wade, pregnant women have the right to have an abortion during the first three months of pregnancy; may have an abortion under state supervision during the second three months; and during the final three months may have an abortion only if her life is endangered.

One bill now being considered would require parental or court consent for minors seeking an abortion.

"We are most opposed to this bill because we feel it addresses the parents' supposed right to know what their daughter is up to rather than the rights of the individual," said Shively.

The bill would reqire a minor to have parental consent before seeking an abortion. If parental consent is impossible, the minor would have to go before a judge who would determine if an abortion is necessary. The minor would be granted two appeals.

"I think a minor knows whether she can talk to her parents," Shively said. "That shouldn't be for the courts to decide."

NARAL also opposes another bill that requires mandatory reporting of abortions. She said no other surgical procedure has this requirement.

"We feel this law may lead to increased harassment of physicians who perform abortions," said Shively. "This bill would make it possible to identify the doctors by the county they serve."

A third bill would prohibit public funding of abortions and would prohibit public employees from encouraging or counseling a woman to have an abortion. NARAL opposes this legislation because it would restrict public health care providers.

Medicare benefit fund rises, still too low, authority says

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Social Security fund that pays for Medicare hospital benefits improved over the past year but still faces bankruptcy shortly after the turn of the century, the fund's trustees said Tuesday.

While last year's report to Congress predicted the fund would be exhausted in 1996, the one this year says it can get by through 2002.

But given that the question is not whether but when the fund will expire, the trustees said, "Early corrective action is essential in order to avoid the need for later, potentially precipitous changes." The same language was used in the 1986 report.

The 1987 report calculates that making the Hospital Insurance Trust Fund solvent over the next 25 years would require a 13 percent reduction in Medicare expenditures or a 15 percent increase in contributions.

The Medicare hospital program is financed by Social Security payroll taxes.

On the rosier side, the trustees reported that two other Social Security insurance funds — the old age and survivors fund and the disability fund — continue to be in good shape for the next 75 years.

And they noted that "although the supplementary medical insurance program is financially sound," the so-called Part B side of the Medicare program that pays doctor bills has been doubling in size every five or six years and shows no sign of slowing down.

Juco students examine transition experiences

By STACEY CAMPBELL
Collegian Reporter

Some K-State students view their community college experience as the bleak point in an otherwise exciting college career.

But one representative at the Community College Conference Tuesday said transfer students believe it is a learning bridge.

"The students see the community college as a good experience, a very useful bridge from high school to the larger institution," said Virginia Freeman, representative from Johnson County Community College.

The biennial conference, which met in the Union, allowed transfer students to share their successes and failures in making the transition to the University with community college representatives, said Barbara Dawes, associate director of admissions.

"We saw some positive students today," Freeman said. "The students had a good transition. By and large, there was no difficulty in transferring to K-State."

Freeman said students should use counseling services and work with their academic advisers in the community colleges.

"Students don't have to plan on their own," she said. "They can use the services, which can be a significant help."

Nancy Odgers, junior in human ecology and mass communication, said she had no problems transferring from Garden City Community College.

"Everything transferred, because I knew from the beginning what I wanted to do," she said. "When I was a freshman I took K-State's catalog, which had the requirements for graduation, and used it to plan my classes for juco.

"I had an excellent adviser. If K-State had to have family development, and Garden City Community College offered parenting, my adviser would call K-State and see if it would transfer."

Alison Pacheco, sophomore in architectural engineering, said community college classes are much smaller than classes at K-State.

"I had a friend who had seven kids in her calculus class at her junior college. The lectures up here are bigger, and there is no chance of asking a question," Pacheco said. "She got an 'A' out of calculus at the junior college, and I got a 'B' here, but I felt I learned it."

Pacheco said a major problem with transfer students is they do not listen when others tell them they will "have to put out the work" at a university.

"Here, some classes are so concentrated that sometimes it's like a dump truck has backed up and unloaded on you," she said.

Bob Geiger, director of guidance at Neosho County Community College, said transfer students need to preplan their curricula.

"The kids know where they stand if they make the effort to come into our office and find out information from the equivalency manual," he said.

Community college representatives listened to a panel of transfer students who talked about experiences at community colleges and K-State.

"I think it's typical of previous conferences," Dawes said. "Some schools have a good turnout, like Johnson County and Pratt (County Community College), but some places don't have a good attendance by students."

Although Kathy Formicola, representative from Labette County Community College, had no one stop by her table, she said she still felt the conference was effective.

"It's good to visit here," Formicola said. "The presentation this morning and the student panel were very effective."

CBS News' salmonella report fails miserably

"60 Minutes" has become the broadcast version of the "National Enquirer."

Its Sunday edition revealed to the American audience that their portrayal of the truth can no longer be absorbed without a handful of salt.

Food science professors said their phones nearly rang off the hooks Monday as they again and again calmed the erratic fears whipped up by the show about salmonella in chicken. Not only did the reporters succeed in getting many audience members to swear off eating chicken for the rest of their lives, but in their misdirected effort they emphasized the wrong angle of the story.

Instead of swinging the light toward the ethics of meat inspectors and those individuals who see questionable meat products go through and make no attempt to stop it, the reporters issued almost a command that chicken is bad meat and should not be eaten.

While salmonella bacteria can cause intestinal disorders, types of food poisoning and, in extreme cases, typhoid fever, the scandal of the major sources of these problems is that the victims are most often the perpetrators.

The truth is, people usually poison themselves by leaving food sit in the open instead of putting it in airtight containers and storing it in the refrigerator. Unsanitary practices in the kitchen contribute to more food poisonings than has ever been accounted for by salmonella in uncooked chicken.

One would have to eat truckload upon truckload of the chickens to ever get ill.

Re-educating illiterate grads won't be simple

If you can read this, thank a teacher. This is the message of a popular bumper sticker that proclaims the driver's profession. It also has some truth. But what about those who were graduated and cannnot read?

Rep. Denise Apt, R-Iola, introduced a bill in a House committee meeting that would require school districts to pay the cost of an illiterate graduate to learn basic skills.

Although Apt introduced the bill only as "food for thought," it opens a can of worms with which Kansans need to struggle.

There are a number of truths and falsehoods surrounding the determination of who is responsible for ill-prepared graduates:

True — if a person graduates from high school without being able to function in society as far as math and reading are concerned, it is a sad story.

False — it is always the school district's fault.

True — the person had to have known that he or she couldn't read but did nothing about it. It didn't matter as long as he or she got through the system.

False — every teacher is as dedicated as we like to think he or she is. Some may have passed a student just to get him or her out of the class.

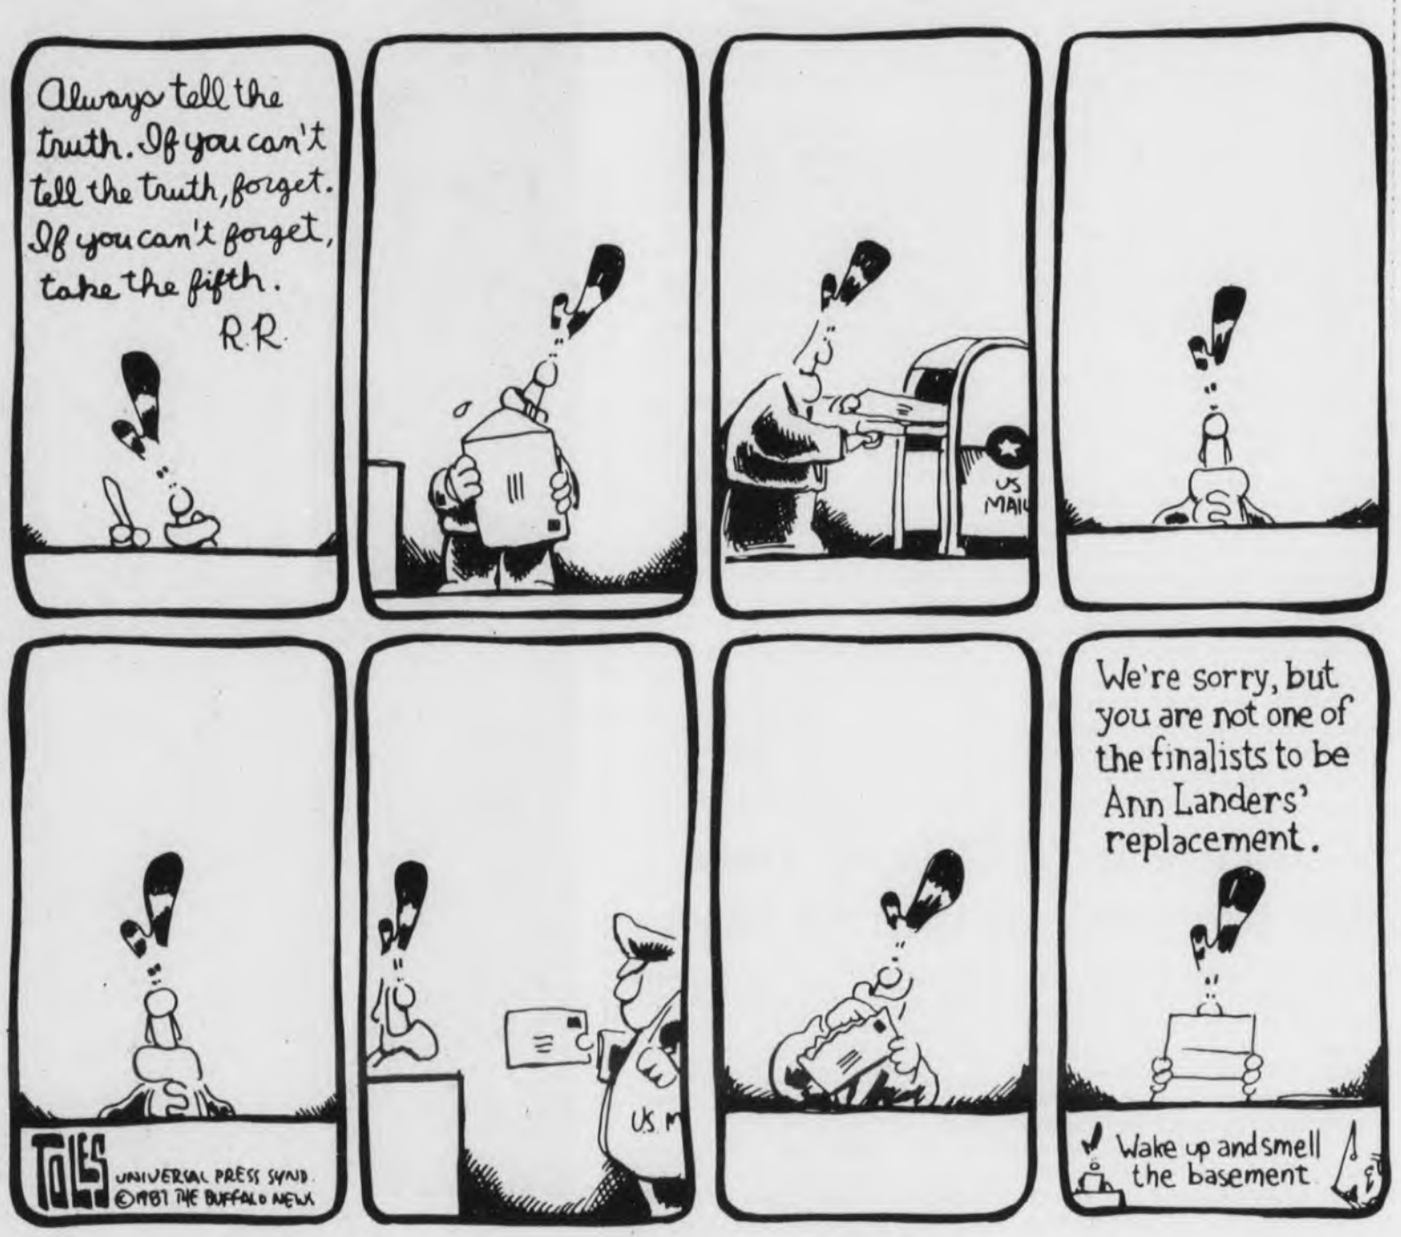
Those who were able to get through school without learning the fundamentals have probably discovered that they need the fundamentals to get along in life, but whose fault is it?

If the school districts have to use their money to pay for past problems, where is it going to come from? With recent budget cuts, most schools are cutting corners already.

Any extra costs may harm the quality of the education that is being taught now. Can the school districts really introduce a curriculum to teach the basics to those graduates who did not learn the first time around without hampering the teaching process of those going through the system now?

Just some "food for thought."

Debate on waste issue must judge all aspects



In the ever-growing controversy concerning Kansas' involvement in the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact, it is attitudes like N. Dean Eckhoff's, head of the Department of Nuclear Engineering, that, if put into action, will make parts of Kansas virtually uninhabitable.

If Eckhoff — or anyone for that matter — thinks the thousands of Kansans who are loudly questioning the state's disposal of nuclear waste are concerned with money and not their lives and future, then he is dead wrong.

All those people who have come to the harsh reality of what below-ground storage of low-level radioactive waste would mean to the future of Kansas are concerned about health, clean water, a place to raise children and maintaining America's breadbasket.

These Kansans are not simply looking for something to complain about, as Eckhoff implies.

Attitudes such as Eckhoff's are dangerous. We should not let the policy makers in Topeka choose the life that we must live based on quick and messy decisions — such as the one that put Kansas in the compact — or based on the uncaring attitudes of people who are so caught up in the nuclear way of life that their judgment has been clouded.

Driven to death

Trend toward suicide confusing

I hear the sounds of spring in a swallow's song and I see the sights of spring in yellow forsythia blossoms. In spring, I long to be new and fresh, to fly somewhere as a butterfly, to follow the wind to heaven. However, when it is windy or rainy like today, sad memories of adolescent suicide come across my mind.

If the goddess of fortune came and asked me, "Which stage of life would you choose if I gave you the chance to live again,?" I would immediately choose adolescence without any hesitation, since adolescence is the springtime of life. In my thought, adolescence is a golden period in the life span. A young person is fresh, lively, vivid and vigorous.

I like adolescents, their freshness, youth and idealistic thoughts. You, as adolescents, have strong possibilities, aspirations and dynamic potential power that you can use to run and operate our future society. So, there is no doubt that we would call you "the hope of the next generation." However, today, adolescents are vociferous and outspoken critics. They have often been in the front of social change and have often been felt as "threatening" to their elders.

As you know, a gardener waters and fertilizes a good soil in order to raise plants. The gardener sometimes moves the plants in order for them to receive more sunshine or to protect them from storms and cold weather. A gardener is always taking care of the plants as a mother cares for her children. Nevertheless, if one day the plants were to die before blossoming, could you really understand the gardener's suffering and disappointment?

My loved adolescents, let's talk heart to heart and go beyond the "generation gap." I would like to describe a mother's feelings and I hope you understand mother's deep and wide love. When I recognized that I was pregnant, I was really pleased with this new life. Even though pregnancy was never easy to tolerate, I could endure those sufferings because of the expectation of your new life.

After passing through the months of pregnancy, I had to endure tremendous labor pains in order for you to enter this new world. As soon as I saw your face and your figure, my labor pains were gone and I felt the mystery of life. Since then, you have been my hope and my love itself.

But now, I am concerned about you as you progress through adolescence. I think you have already read the article about the adolescents' group suicide. Adolescents today seem to be running toward death even though they do not understand the meaning of death.

During adolescence, emotional feelings are very sensitive. You think depression, anger and loneliness are given only to you. Therefore, you sometimes come to hate parents, friends, teachers and the world. I am sure your various emotional feelings are absolutely normal. Even your mother felt this way 20 years ago.

The important thing to remember is that if you wear gloomy glasses, the world will look gloomy. However, if you focus the glasses to the bright side, the world looks very bright, and you can think, walk and run toward your hope and dreams.

If you were your mother's age and your grandmother's age, you would understand that youth is a most precious thing. When I see you and your friends, I can smile since you remind me of my own adolescence.

Please, don't be foolish enough to use drugs and alcohol, and never try to commit suicide. You can live your life only once, not twice. I hope you have beautiful and valuable memories of your adolescence to keep in your mind forever.

Cultural diversity

Editor,

A couple of years ago, I attended a community college that was fortunate enough to have several international students attending. These international students were from various countries such as Egypt, France, India, Iran and Iraq. As the school year passed, I had made friends with a few of these students.

I learned a lot about them, their countries and their customs, as well as helping them adjust to our odd country, language and customs of the United States. That year several U.S. citizens were taken hostage by a "terrorist" group. This caused great turbulance and frustration in the United States about who was responsible for these actions.

U.S. citizens therefore took their frustrations out on the international students who were here in the United States, stereotyping them all as terrorists. As a result, the international students going to this community college did not come back the next year, and that college lost a lot of money and cultural education because of the unjust stereotyping of international students.

Here at K-State we have a chance to learn about other countries as well as to help them learn about our country. We have 867 international students from 92 countries enrolled. These students are here to get an education, not cause trouble. They all have had to work hard to get here, pay lots of money and be far from home.

While interviewing Khalil Allan from Palestine and Raphael Fiallos Estrada from Honduras, they both mentioned that the hardest thing for them here at K-State is adjusting to the different culture of the United States with its language, food and customs.

This week being International Week, I encourage all of you to visit with international students, take a tour through the International Student Center on campus and to visit the Union's international presentations and activities.

Fire safety concern

Editor,

I am concerned with the fire safety of duplexes and one-family housing units in Manhattan. All other types of housing — triplexes and larger; residence halls and University apartments — are inspected at least once a year by the fire marshall. Also, these housing units usually have or require smoke detectors and fire extinguishers.

My reasons for concern for safety of duplexes and smaller housing units are: One, there are no laws in Manhattan requiring landlords or homeowners of duplexes and smaller units to have housing regularly inspected. Two, the fire department doesn't have the manpower to check every residence once a year. And three, requiring a yearly check would invade the privacy domain of homeowners.

The best solution to this problem involves three steps. First, inform tenants of fire safety through an article in the Collegian or other newspapers at the start of each fall semester. Second, install or have your landlord install smoke detectors and fire extinguishers. These safety devices could save your life, enable you to put out small fires yourself and should lower your landlord's fire insurance premiums.

The final step for fire safety would be to get a courtesy check. This is a free fire safety inspection by the Manhattan fire marshall and is available upon request. After these steps are taken, you should have safe living quarters and a better peace of mind.

Directory accuracy

Editor,

Student Publications Inc. publishes each school year a campus directory. This directory serves as a great resource to students and faculty alike. Recently, I have become aware of the vast amount of inaccurate and omitted information published in the listings within the campus directory.

First of all, students must take the responsibility for maintaining accurate records at the Registrar's Office, located in Anderson Hall. Each student's listing in the directory comes from their enrollment forms, which are on file at the Registrar's Office.

Second, students should be notified of the opportunity to update or correct information before the listings are sent to press. Often, students do not know their new phone number because their phones have not yet been connected at the time of enrollment. Therefore, students are listed without a phone number. Students could be notified of this opportunity either during enrollment or possibly through an advertisement in the Collegian.

Finally, I suggest that the office of Student Publications delay the printing of the directory by two weeks. This would allow all students, faculty, staff and Student Publications more time for bringing all sources together. It is my belief that K-State students can wait two more weeks for a more accurate directory. I am not asking for the directory to be perfect, but for it to be used to its full potential the accuracy of the directory must increase.

Technique aids wheat study

New cultures of plant fiber divide traits

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Agronomy is using the new technology of wheat tissue cultures to research and develop new varieties of wheat, said Rollin Sears, associate professor of agronomy and K-State wheat breeder.

"The main responsibility of the wheat program at K-State is to generate wheat varieties for the Kansas wheat grower," Sears said. "The tissue culture is one form of technology to see inside of a plant and help develop new varieties."

The tissue culture is made up of callus, clusters of cells grown on a plate with the essential nutrients needed to make the cells grow. By changing the growth regulators of the plate media, the cells regenerate and eventually grow into a wheat plant, Sears said.

'We've spent since 1980 trying to understand what happens to the cell when you put it into a culture and regenerate a plant instead of going through a seed.' — Rollin Sears

With the help of 15 students, Sears said his research includes "selecting at the cellular level certain traits we hope are expressed at the whole plant level."

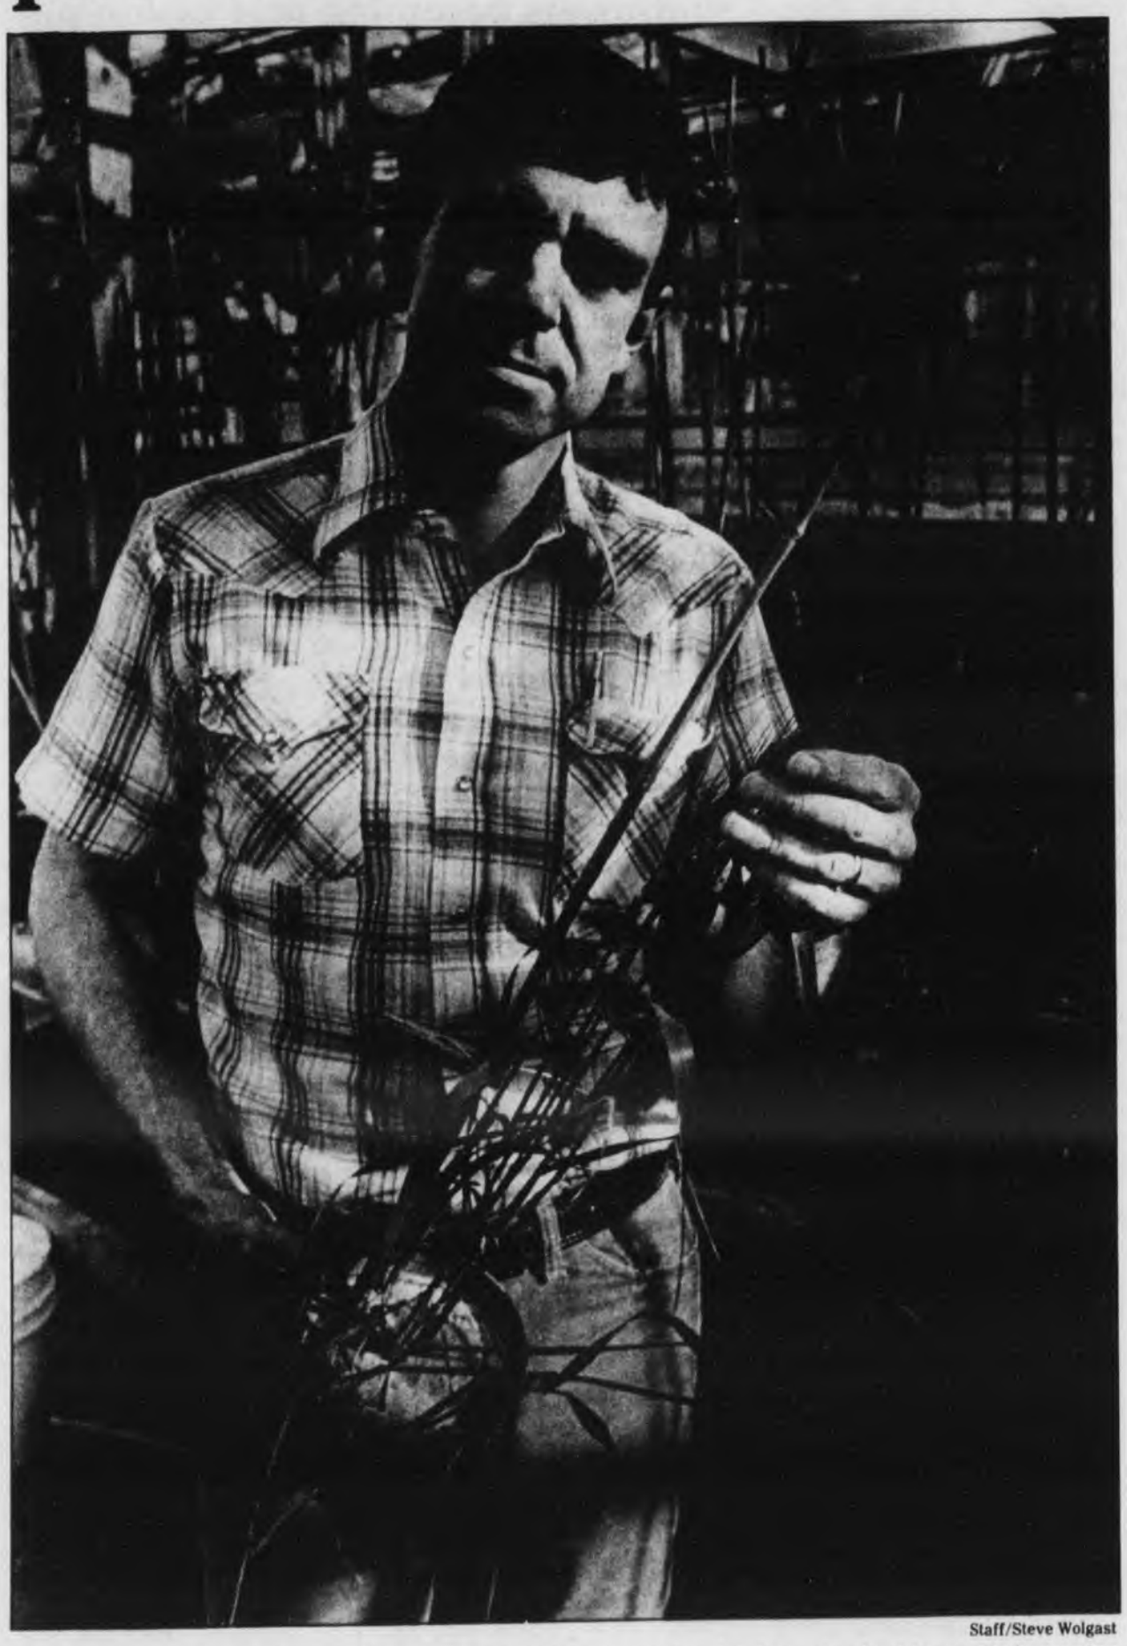
With the tissue culture research, Sears said he is able to select wheat for herbicide resistance and manipulate the amino acid content of wheat. He also said he hopes to and thinks he can change the response of plants to certain growth regulators, and improve heat and drought tolerance.

Sears said the wheat breeding program at K-State deals with using the germ plasm of wheat to select for genetic variability and to make improvements in the wheat plant. Sears' wheat research also includes identifying genetic variabilities, doing yield tests and quality evaluations of the wheat grown, increasing the seed numbers and making that seed available to the Kansas farmer.

The tissue culture research fits into this program by "selecting genes at the cellular level more efficiently than at the whole-plant level," Sears said. The tissue culture will not "speed up the breeding process, but it allows for selection of genotypes a little easier."

The research started in 1974 with cell culture work, Sears said. Five years later the research was successful in regenerating the wheat plants.

"We've spent since 1980 trying to understand what happens to the cell when you put it into a culture and regenerate a plant instead of going through a seed."



Sears said he checks for forms of genetic instability, kinds of mutations formed and how long the cultures can be kept.

Sears said he is now trying to apply his findings to other tests. One test he is trying is adding herbicide to the plate of growing cells and selecting for those cells that are able to grow. Sears also looks for mutations that are resistant to certain herbicides.

A herbicide is sprayed on wheat crops to control the weed grasses that invade the fields. But the herbicide has to be applied carefully because it is toxic to the wheat, Sears said.

"It would be nice to select a herbicide-resistant wheat plant that will tolerate these chemicals effectively," Sears said.

Funds for the research come from state and federal government support of the wheat breeding program, Sears said. Support also comes from the Kansas Wheat Commission, the Kansas Crop Improvement Association, competitive grants and private companies.

FFA headquarters' relocation possible in Topeka offices

By STACEY CAMPBELL
Collegian Reporter

The Future Farmers of America state office headquarters on campus may be moved to the Kansas Department of Education offices in Topeka if a proposal submitted by Dean Prochaska, the state director of vocational education, is enacted.

The proposal states: "As of July 1, all vocational student organization offices will move to Topeka."

Moving the four vocational student organization offices to Topeka would resolve salary problems for state advisers, increase visibility of the student organizations, strengthen communications and allow for a more equitable distribution of funds, according to a proposal written by Prochaska.

Although Prochaska's proposal does not require State Board of Education approval, it will be on the board's April agenda.

"The proposal really is not a board decision — it's an administrative decision," Prochaska said. "I fully expect to see it (the move) take place."

Earl Wineinger, state executive secretary for the FFA/Young Farmers and Young Farm Women, said his office has not received funding for next year, which means the proposed move could become a reality.

"The department sends money to K-State to fund this program, and the state has not asked to do this project for next year," he said. "The money has not been contracted to K-State."

Wineinger said the state department believes moving the offices to Topeka would increase communication between personnel in his office and the state department.

"It has worked before. I served there for seven years, but at that time there were four or five people specifically assigned on the state level for agriculture with the state Department of Education," Wineinger said. "Now we have less than one person and maybe no one at all."

Wineinger said retaining the offices at K-State would have economic and management benefits.

"The state officers are at K-State, which is an advantage from an economic standpoint to keep the office here," he said. "Over the last six years, 35 of the 36 state officers for the FFA have attended K-State.

"To me, K-State is the heart of Kansas education in agriculture," Wineinger said. "If I need an expert in an area I can go to that department and get information."

He said the location on campus allowed the personnel in the office to become acquainted with the FFA adviser.

"Once in a while, I'll teach a class which allows me to become acquainted with FFA advisers," Wineinger said. "When I was in Topeka, we didn't do that, and we wouldn't have the rapport that we now have."

The state FFA officers have talked to state Board of Education members and other state officials about the proposal to move the office.

"As state officers our concern is not so much where the office is, but that it continues to serve the members as it does now," said Mary Wilson, freshman in animal sciences and industry and state FFA president.

'As state officers our concern is not so much where the office is, but that it continues to serve the members as it does now.' — Mary Wilson

"In the last 10 years we have gone from five vocational agriculture personnel at the state level to one part-time vocational agriculture specialist," she said. "We fear that our executive secretary's duties may dwindle as far as FFA is concerned, and he may be required to do state Department of Education duties."

"The state FFA adviser use to be just agriculture, and now he does other things," Weneinger said. "The state department (of education) trend is to not identify with career areas."

"The administrations that are making promises as to the services we will receive could all be replaced within three years," Wilson said. "However, the 10-member (state Board of Education) did ask to hear the other side before making any decisions. They do have an honest concern."

Jan Bowers, state adviser for Future Homemakers of America and Home Economics Related Occupations located at Emporia State, said she was opposed to the move because it will decrease the services provided to the organizations.

"Having compared our office structure to that of state advisers housed inside state departments, I feel that our current structure has allowed us to operate at maximum productivity," she said.

"In the past it appears that those representatives' job descriptions change and they are given additional responsibilities when housed in Topeka," Bowers said.

The two other vocational education student organization offices are the Distributive Education Clubs of America and Office Education Association offices at Emporia State and the Vocational Industrial Clubs of America at Pittsburg State University.

Opera group stages 'tragedy' of Butterfly

By JEAN TELLER
Collegian Reviewer

An attentive and appreciative full house greeted the New York City Opera National Company's production of "Madama Butterfly." Thrilled by the lead soprano, Karen Notare as Butterfly, the audience saw the company portray the life and tragedy of Butterfly in unforgettable excellence.

First produced in 1904, the opera was adapted by Giacomo Puccini from a one-act play by American playwright David Belasco. Puccini continued to change his score of "Madama Butterfly" and finished with his revisions in 1911.

The opera details a three-year span in the life of Cio-Cio San, known as Butterfly. As a child of 15, she marries Lt. Benjamin Pinkerton of the U.S. Navy. Pinkerton contracts with a marriage broker to marry Butterfly, with the stipulation that the contract can be broken at any time. Butterfly, on the other hand, marries Pinkerton for life.

The expected break occurs when Pinkerton leaves for the United States and abandons Butterfly. She remains faithful, caring for his child and waiting for his return. Pinkerton does return but with his "real" American wife. The loss of her honor leaves Butterfly the one available recourse in her culture — death.

Notare was the highlight of the cast and Pinkerton was handsomely portrayed by Michael Philip Davis. The supporting cast included Ron Peo as an incomparable Sharpless, the American counsel and Pinkerton's friend; Joan Tirrell as faithful Suzuki, Butterfly's handmaiden and friend; and an adorable Melissa Meli as Trouble, Butterfly's son by Pinkerton.

As an aside, it was said by W.C. Fields that an actor should never share the stage with an animal or a child, unless the actor wanted the show to be stolen from him. This was definitely the case with Meli. She was a bright spot on stage in spite of the tragic plotline.

The company was supported by an excellent orchestra conducted by Ted Taylor. A beautiful set was designed by Peter Dean Beck and superb costuming done by Malabar Ltd. The set and costumes were fantastic, as was the music.

High opera is difficult at the best of times to understand and appreciate. The New York company utilized a screen above the stage to project English subtitles to the Italian lyrics. The subtitles did aid the audience in understanding some of the subtleties of the script, particularly the humor. However, the screen was difficult to see for some. Since we have been conditioned to look for the subtitles at the bottom of a movie or television screen instead of above a stage, it was also difficult to focus on the action while still staying current with the words on the screen.

Another difficulty was inherent in the opera itself. It was somewhat disconcerting to hear Italian being sung by American and Japanese characters. In the long-run this fact probably really doesn't matter in opera, but did strike me as being incongruous.

The opera was a treat for the eyes and the ears despite the incongruities.

Kansas 'weed' gaining new reputation

By SUSAN STAGGENBORG
Collegian Reporter

Kansas did not receive its nickname the Sunflower State for nothing. The big, yellow flowers once considered weeds now have a more favorable reputation.

The state's sunflower role is becoming more evident as sunflower seeds become an important cash crop in Kansas.

Kansas farmers in increasing numbers are looking to sunflowers as an alternative crop. Farmers are producing sunflowers as a highly profitable crop compared with double-cropped soybeans, which have lower yields and higher production costs, according to a Cooperative Extension Service publication.

Ray Lamond, extension agronomist, said sunflowers are not a new crop to western Kansas but are to producers in eastern Kansas.

"In western Kansas, where there is less rainfall, sunflowers are used because of their ability to produce reasonable yields as a full-season crop," Lamond said. Sunflowers have a dense and massive root system capable of reaching underground water during dry seasons.

For sunflowers to be produced in eastern Kansas, there must be a potential market to handle them, he said. Another problem is the small number of elevators that handle sunflowers, he said.

"In the past three or four years, there has been an increase in the use of sunflowers as a double crop, a majority of the interest has been as a double crop after wheat," he said.

Sunflowers mature within 90-100 days of planting and grow to a height of 4-7 feet, although the recent addition of dwarfing genes is reducing heights to 14-18 inches.

The size of the brightly colored head varies depending on the planting rate. Plants grown close together produce small heads, and plants placed farther apart have larger heads.

Sunflower seeds are produced and marketed as two different types: confectionary seeds, for use in salad bars and as quick snacks, and other varieties of seeds produced for their oil content.

"Most acreage in Kansas is used for the oil type," Lamond said. "Sunflower oil is big business." Sunflower oil has good cooking oil qualities.

Sunflowers becoming new cash crop

'Sunflowers are here to stay. It promises to be a versatile crop; it will probably be around for a while.'
— Ray Lamond

In western Kansas, interest in the confectionary seed has increased.

Sunflowers are planted and harvested much like corn and milo. They can be planted with any row crop planter and can be harvested directly with a combine. For the harvesting to be efficient, the combine should have a sunflower pan to eliminate seed loss.

Full-season crop sunflowers are planted around the first of May and mature similar to corn and milo. As a double crop, planting can start as late as mid-July for harvest in October or November.

"Sunflower yield is measured in pounds per acre, unlike corn and milo crops which are measured in bushels per acre," Lamond said. The full-season sunflower will average 1,500-3,000 pounds per acre, and the double-cropped seeds will vary from 800-2,400 pounds per acre.

As a cash crop sunflowers have been growing quickly as evidenced by the increased number of tests performed on sunflower seeds. In Kansas two years ago, no sunflower seeds were tested; this year, there were 42 entries in performance tests, including 38 oil types and four confectionary types, he said. The performance testing is open to any company that would like to participate in the nationwide testing of sunflower varieties.

"Like a lot of our crops, we like to see a better profit, but the price is not really good," Lamond said. The current price for sunflower seeds at the Belleville processing center is 6 cents a pound.

Many farmers are reluctant to produce sunflower seeds because the sunflower is not eligible for government programs, Lamond said.

Not having a potential market or processing center in Kansas has been a problem with producing sunflowers. It is costly to ship the seeds out of state, decreasing the profit for the farmer.

"North central Kansas has different buyers that haul to processing centers in North Dakota in exchange for feed oats. This way they don't come back with empty trucks," Lamond said.

"A new processing plant in northwest Kansas that opened last summer will be handling confectionary seeds and supplying the West Coast market," he said.

"Sunflowers are here to stay," Lamond said. "It promises to be a versatile crop; it will probably be around for a while."

AIDS 'devastating' sex disease, doctor says

Editor's Note: This is the third in a daily five-part series dealing with AIDS. On Thursday, the possibility of a preventative AIDS vaccine being developed will be examined and a speech by Eric Schuman, a physician's assistant who works with the Topeka AIDS Project lecturing on safe sex, will be covered.

The reality of AIDS

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

From the jungles of Africa to the streets of New York, AIDS has become the most "devastating sexually transmitted disease" in the United States.

The public needs to be aware of the facts about the virus and its implications, said William Wade, president of the Kansas AIDS Network and Topeka specialist on sexually transmitted diseases.

Until 1981, AIDS was unknown. The disease was discovered after five previously healthy gay men contracted Pneumocystis carinii pneumonia, the most common AIDS-related infection, he said to an audience of about 15 Tuesday night in the Union Big Eight Room.

The finding was made at the same time that a doctor in France diagnosed gay men with Kaposi's sarcoma. This form of cancer, rarely found in young people, was also determined to be a symptom in AIDS patients, he said.

There is "overwhelming evidence the virus came from Africa," and originated in monkeys, Wade said. A monkey probably bit a human and the disease began its course. He said people who were infected in Africa then brought the disease to Haiti, a popular vacation spot for homosexuals in the early 1980s.

Homosexuals who contracted the virus returned to the United States and infected people in New York and California, where half of the approximately 33,000 cases are today. The disease has since permeated throughout the nation, and there are about 58 cases in Kansas.

AIDS has been contracted through intravenous drug abuse and blood transfusions, however, 74 percent of the cases were transmitted by homosexuals and 4 percent resulted from heterosexual contact.

AIDS is "primarily a sexually tranmitted disease," he said. "No matter what we do; no matter what we say — sex is going to continue, and as long as people have sex, people are going to have sexually transmitted diseases," Wade said.

He said schools have a responsibility to teach students about AIDS and the use of condoms to prevent spreading the disease.

"It's not going to make them have sex earlier or more frequently," he said. "Hopefully it will make them more responsible."

Wade, who distributed condoms to the audience, said he believes every sexually active person should use condoms. Condoms have been proven to be effective in inhibiting the spread of the virus, he said.

"It can't come screaming through the prophylactic," he said.

Wade said he does not condone the use of intravenous drugs but said he knows "people will do it." He said drug users should not share needles, but if they must use contaminated needles, they should wash them twice with bleach and once with saline to sanitize them.

Less than 500 AIDS cases have occured in children. The majority received the virus from their infected mother. Wade said a woman who has the virus has a 50 percent chance of giving it to an unborn child.

Acquired immune deficiency syndrome is a disease that lowers the body's immune system making it susceptible to opportunistic infections — infections that do not affect healthy individuals but usually become fatal in AIDS patients. About 10 percent of AIDS patients do not contract any opportunistic infections but develop an infection in the brain, he said.

The AIDS virus can also cause less severe diseases, including persistent generalized lymphadenopathy, persistently swollen lymph nodes, and AIDS-Related Complex. ARC is a more severe disease which entails damage to the immune system opening the body to illnesses but not to opportunistic infections.

Wade said 20 percent to 30 percent of people who test positive to the virus will develop AIDS. There are no statistics on the number of people who will develop PGL or ARC, he said. Because the disease, which can remain dormant, has only been in the United States for about six years, the percentage of people contracting AIDS could be much higher than the current estimate, Wade said.

AIDS "will affect all of us sooner or later if it hasn't already," he said.

Course to study sexually transmitted diseases

By TIM STALEY
Collegian Reporter

In an attempt to enlighten the public about sexually transmitted diseases, the Division of Biology will be offering an informational course during summer intersession.

"The Biology of Sexually Transmitted Diseases" will give an overview of STDs and a review of the human sexual anatomy, said Barbara Schmidt Johnson, instructor of biology.

The class will study the organisms that cause STDs, the generalized response of the body to the diseases and a survey of the diseases, she said.

In addition, Johnson said the course will cover the symptoms, consequences, diagnosis, treatment and prevention of STDs.

"I hope that students for whom it's appropriate learn something that's relevant to their own lives," she said.

"For instance, if they are sexually active, I hope it will help them understand some of the risks that they are taking and ways to avoid those risks," Johnson said.

To accomplish this, Johnson said, students would have to know about the diseases and certain procedures that might help them avoid risk.

"The one thing that I think is most critical is understanding why STDs are so important," she said. "This is something I haven't appreciated until the last month, until I really started investigating and doing some studying on my own.

"The thing that I have found significant about the disorders that I hadn't appreciated before is the fact that they affect a lot more people than I realized," Johnson said.

More than 10 million people in the United States contract various forms of STDs every year. About 110,000 women are left sterile, and 300,000 babies either die or have birth defects as a result of STDs every year.

It is important to realize that a large number of people are actually involved, Johnson said.

"The consequences of STDs are quite significant," she said. "People have to be more informed."

Johnson said the way she approaches the course depends on the students enrolled.

"I'm going to try to make some adjustments for the background of the students," she said. "Different types of students will be able to get out of it what they particularly need.

"If I have a bunch of freshman and sophomore students who are interested in the subject just out of curiosity and don't have any need for it professionaly, we'll approach (the class) one way," Johnson said.

"If there are some people who are in social work or education that feel they really need to have an in-depth understanding of what's going on, then I'll approach it a little differently."

The War and the Future of the Muslim Nation of Iraq

The catastrophe in Iraq under the nightmare of the present regime, which is being supported by the U.S. military and intellegent apparatus has led the expulsion of Iraqi citizens, unjust imprisonment and execution of hundreds of thousands of men, women, professional people, students, professors, aged people and even children. The 1986 General Report of Amnesty International has attested to the crimes of the regime of Iraq, especially the killing of children under torture in order to extract confessions from their parents. The brutality and atrocities against the people of Iraq reached its peak in 1980 when the regime committed one of the most criminal acts by horribly torturing and killing Mohammad Baqir Al-Sadar, an eminent thinker and philosopher, and his sister, a prominant writer, simply because of their opposition to the regimes authoritarian rule. The head of the regime, Saddam Al-Tikriti, who is being supported by the current U.S. administration (on the CIA direct assistance and involvement in Iraq, see Washington Post, Dec. 15 and 16, 1986), has repeatedly admitted that, "We meticulously and publicly decapitate anyone who is discovered opposing up." (See Middle East Contemporary Survey 1981-81, p. 586). The Iraqi people, therefore, appeal to your conscious to support its struggle against the daily crimes and barbarism of the current regime in Iraq.

Dr. Yaser Al-Hamdani, from England, is to present a lecture on this topic. The public is invited.

'Mannequin' characters 'too phoney'

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

The movie "Mannequin" and the U.S. Postal Service have the same problem: They both promise more than they deliver.

Film Review

Andrew McCarthy ("Pretty In Pink," "Class") plays Jonathan Switcher, a down and out unemployable who is hired as a stockboy at Illustra, a once powerful metropolitan department store.

Having worked as a mannequin maker, Jonathan fancies himself an artist, but he has a girlfriend who thinks he's a dreamer. Hired by the store owner (Estelle Getty), Jonathan proceeds to charm and antagonize everyone he trips over, trips up or trips on.

Promoted to window displays, he meets the wooden woman of his dreams (one he'd made earlier), and she magically comes to life and calls herself Emmy. Played by Kim Catrall, the two instantly fall in love and spend their evenings frolicking through the store and having more fun than the audience.

For an added bonus, the film has more backstabbers than Irangate. Illustra, having very stiff competition, is in the midst of a hostile takeover attempt by a rival store. The store is riddled with spies and cohorts willing to do anything to knock down the store's profits even more.

The corrupt parties range from the meek — a neurotic security guard Maxwell and his dog Rambo — to the mighty — a chairman of the board played by Harry Dean Stanton.

With the help of Emmy, Jonathan becomes a citywide sensation by creating such fantastic window displays that they increase the store's profits. One of Jonathan's co-workers is the hilarious, finger-snapping Hollywood Montrose. He is one of the few supporters and confidants in Jonathon's efforts to please the boss while staying ahead of the competition.

The script itself has more holes in it than Paul Schafer's hairpiece. It shows promise until dippy Emmy comes to life and wrecks the whole show. She's a babbling airhead and isn't the least bit interesting. Her existence is never explained in the first place. If that's not enough, we're supposed to believe that a mere window display saves an entire department store and provokes its competition to actually kidnap all the store's mannequins.

Worst of all, the characters are either too thin or too phoney to be believed even for a screwball comedy like this. Harry Dean Stanton played a perfect, snotty jerk in "Pretty In Pink," however the greasy-haired, over-acted clone in this film is a complete joke.

How they roped poor Estelle Getty into this flick is anyone's guess. As the struggling but supposedly fiesty owner of Illustra, she has some of the weakest lines in the movie.

As the star of the film, McCarthy is a pale shadow compared to Hollywood, who all but steals the show with his pink Cadillac and license tag that says "BAD GIRL."

This movie is not only boring but mindless. It has a guy who talks to a mannequin, a security guard who talks to his dog, and it'll have you talking to the screen saying, "How did I get in here?"

Basically it's a cute idea blown way out of proportion. The script, the acting — everything is underdeveloped and rushed. It's a lot like an underbaked loaf of bread: nice and brown outside and soggy and doughy in the middle.

Salvadoran rebels kill soldiers, U.S. adviser

By The Associated Press

EL PARAISO, El Salvador — Guerrillas raided a major army base before dawn Tuesday, killing at least 43 soldiers and a U.S. military adviser, the first to die during battle in the 7-year-old civil war.

El Salvador's military commander said the American, identified as Staff Sgt. Gregory A. Fronius, 27, of Greensburg, Pa., was killed by mortar fire near a command post.

The military said 35 soldiers were wounded by leftist rebels who assaulted the base behind a barrage of cannon, mortar and grenade fire. Base commander Col. Gilberto Rubio, who was slightly wounded, said the number of attackers had not been determined.

Officials said seven guerrillas died in the attack on the 4th Infantry Brigade garrison at El Paraiso in Chalatenango province, a rebel stronghold, and some penetrated the camp. El Paraiso is nearly 40 miles north of San Salvador, capital of this Central American country.

"Because of the seriousness of the injuries, the number of dead (soldiers) may increase," said Gen. Adolfo Blandon, chief of the armed forces. He visited the base to assess the situation.

Soldiers on the scene estimated government casualties at about 65 dead and more than 100 wounded.

According to U.S. policy, American advisers do not participate in offensive military action or enter areas where combat is occurring or likely, but may visit "carefully selected and secure sites" such as garrisons. They are armed and may respond if fired upon.

The United States has a self-imposed ceiling of 55 on the number of advisers serving in El Salvador at one time, but fewer sometimes are on duty.

Tuesday's rebel attack was the largest since a June 1986 guerrilla assault on the army base at San Miguel, 86 miles east of San Salvador. The military said 50 soldiers were killed or wounded there, but the rebels claimed a total of 250.

U.S. Embassy spokesman Pen Agnew said Fronius was training Salvadoran troops at the El Paraiso garrison.

At the Pentagon in Washington, the Army said he had a wife and child and was assigned to the 3rd Battalion, 7th Special Forces Group, based in Panama.

Revenues uncertain

Refunds may erode surpluses

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — State income from taxes exceeded expert estimates by $28.8 million in March, but Harley Duncan, secretary of revenue, cautioned against anyone thinking the state was on the road to economic recovery.

Duncan said the state is now entering the worst part of the income tax refund season and he said a few large refunds could quickly erode the $33 million surplus which has built up during the first nine months of the fiscal year.

"For example, we already know we'll be paying a corporate tax refund of about $11 million in May and there's an awful lot of activity left to go in the individual income tax," Duncan told his regular monthly news conference.

"There's an awful lot of uncertainty in individual income tax. We have $15.6 million more than the estimates for the year to date, but we may need every penny of it before we're done paying refunds."

The $11 million refund will go to a group of corporations which filed amended tax returns for a number of years. The state audited the returns and found the corporations were entitled to an $11 million refund. Duncan did not identify the corporations, but did say they had decided to file as a group rather than as individual companies.

For the month of March, the corporate tax generated $7.6 million while the six experts on the Consensus Revenue Estimating Group had predicted the state would pay out $12 million more than it took in during the month.

The individual income tax produced $27.5 million in March, or $13.8 million more than anticipated. For the year to date, the income tax has generated $15.6 million more than projected.

The state collected $53.8 million from its 4 percent sales tax, or $3.1 million less than expected. However, the sales tax still is running ahead of the yearly estimates with $5.9 million more in the bank than expected after nine months.

In March, the severance tax produced just $6 million.

CHEESE

a Favorite of Mice and Men

Mice are not the only ones who enjoy a nibble of cheese every now and then. The many varieties of cheese can make any man or mouse a cheese connoisseur.

Cheese is classified in four categories: hard-grating, hard, semisoft and soft.

Hardness of a cheese is largely determined by its moisture content, and when classifying by consistency, the word hard-grating is used to describe natural cheeses that are lowest in moisture content.

To obtain the desired loss of moisture, hard-grating cheeses are ripened for long periods of time, and all have characteristically sharp flavor. The hard-grating cheeses include such varieties as parmesan and romano.

Cheeses with a slightly higher moisture content are placed in the hard cheese group. Cheddar and gouda are hard varieties.

Semisoft cheeses have a higher moisture content, about 45 percent, and soft varieties are higher still.

The semisoft and soft cheeses are more perishable than the hard varieties.

Perhaps the most famous and favorite variety of cheese is the cheddar. The cheddar originated in England and is a relatively firm cheese. Cow's whole milk is used as the basic ingredient. The cheese is allowed to cure for three months to several years, depending upon the cheese and the flavor desired.

The longer the cheese is cured, the sharper the flavor. The sharpness of flavor is caused by the growth of bacteria during the curing period.

The Swiss-type cheeses are semifirm to firm, ripened by bacteria, have distinctive holes or eyes and an equally distinctive sweetish, nutty flavor. The Swiss cheeses originated in Switzerland and have been perfected in other countries as well.

The string cheeses all originated in Italy. Mozzarella and provolone are the most recognized. These are called plastic or string cheeses because of the process the cheese goes through.

The whey is drained from the curd, and the curd is then immersed in hot whey, and then water, and is worked. The cheese is stretched and molded while in a plastic condition. String-like cheeses are used primarily for cooking.

The blue-veined cheeses are grouped together because of the blue-green mold seen running through them. Created by the injection of a mold that spreads throughout the cheese, the blue-green streaks give each variety its sharp flavor.

All cheeses in this variety are cured for different amounts of time. Some are made from cow's and ewe's milk. These varieties include the French bleus, and Roqueforts.

The colby variety of cheese is most popular in the western United States. It is a cheddar-type cheese that is light yellow to bright orange in color. It has a very mild flavor.

Edam cheese is a Dutch import with a buttery mild flavor. It is most recognizable by its bright red wax coating and round shape.

Monterey jack is a semisoft cheese with a mild flavor. Although aged montereys are harder and more zesty, it is a cheese favored by those who prefer a bland cheese.

The most important factor in determining how long a natural cheese will keep is its consistency. A harder cheese will last longer than a softer one. The taste of a cheese is not a reliable way to judge its keeping qualities.

Cheese will last longer if it is wrapped tightly to retain its moisture. Cheese left unrefrigerated, unwrapped or exposed to air will dry out, sweat and eventually spoil.

Cheese can be frozen successfully for six to eight weeks, but it should not be refrozen.

Cheeses are good sources of protein. They are actually the most concentrated source of protein in use and, even if eaten in small amounts, make an important contribution to an individual's daily protein intake.

Cheese is also a concentrated source of calories, although the cottage and part-skim mozzarella are low-calorie choices.

The milkfat in cheese made with whole milk is high compared with those cheeses processed from skim milk. People on modified fat diets should avoid eating the whole-milk cheeses. Cheese is also low in carbohydrates.

Wine and cheese is a classic combination, but wine is not the only beverage that complements cheese. Chilled ale or beer, tart cider and coffee are other good options.

FRIED CHEESE

1 egg
2 tablespoons milk
3/4 cup dried bread crumbs
1 pound firm cheese, well-chilled and cut into 1-inch cubes
1/4 cup all-purpose flour
Salad oil

In a pie plate, beat egg with milk; place crumbs on waxed paper, coat cheese with flour. Dip cheese in egg to coat; then coat with crumbs.

In 4-quart saucepan, heat 2 inches oil to 375 degrees. Fry a few pieces at a time until coating is lightly browned, turning occasionally. Drain on paper towels.

Tip: Choose a firm cheese such as cheddar, fontina, mozzarella, provolone, colby or muenster.

BEER-CHEESE FONDUE

2 cups shredded Swiss cheese
2 cups shredded American cheese
1 tablespoon cornstarch
½ teaspoon dry mustard
1 teaspoon worcestershire sauce
A few drops bottled hot pepper sauce
⅔ cup beer
French bread, cut into bite size pieces, each with 1 crust.

In a mixing bowl, combine cheeses with cornstarch and dry mustard; toss to coat. Add worcesterchire sauce and hot pepper sauce; mix well.

In a saucepan, heat beer just until warm. Gradually add cheese mixture, stirring constantly over medium-low heat till the cheese is melted.

Quickly transfer cheese mixture to a fondue pot; place over a fondue burner. Spear a bread cube with a fondue fork piercing the crust last. Dip bread into cheese mixture, swirling to coat bread. If mixture thickens while standing, stir in additional warm beer.

Dairy plant makes, sells cheese

The Kraft cheese people don't have anything on K-State. At the dairy processing plant in Call Hall, the staff and students process an average of 545 pounds of cheese every Tuesday.

"We follow the standard process of cheesemaking," said Ike Jeon, associate professor in animal sciences and industry. The plant has the equipment available to produce many varieties of cheese.

Cheddar is the primary cheese made at the plant because the consumer demand is for cheddar, Jeon said.

"In the past we've made several other types. We make a process cheese," Jeon said.

The plant receives all of its milk from the Dairy Teaching and Research Center, and the milk is stored before processing at the plant. The plant uses only whole milk that is pasteurized and clarified to destroy organisms such as salmonella, a bacteria that causes disease in animals, Jeon said.

The milk is then heated to 88 degrees and placed into 900-gallon cheese vats. This is where the cheese will be made.

The addition of a starter or bacteria is used to increase the acidity of the milk and to serve as a flavor developer in the cheese.

The milk is then set by adding rennet, a coagulating agent that causes the milk to curdle. After the curds set, the cutting ability is determined by how sharp of a separation is made when the curd is cut. The setting of the milk occurs rapidly.

The curds are then cooked at 100 degrees, and the whey or water is drained off. The curds are cut into nine- or 10-pound slabs, and stacked to drain off the additional water and lower the acidity.

Cheddar is the only cheese that goes through the cheddaring process — the blocking or stacking of the slabs of curds. The acidity of the cheese is determined at this time also.

"You must get the right acidity. This is a more crictical time; if you don't get the right acidity, you don't get a good quality cheese," Jeon said. A pH of five or six is the desired level.

Salt is then added to the curds for taste. The hooping and pressing is the final processing step.

The curds are placed in 44-pound metal boxes or hoops and pressed overnight using a hydraulic press.

After pressing, the blocks of cheese weigh approximately 40 pounds, due to moisture loss, and are placed in plastic bags and put into the aging room. The cheese is aged in a refrigerated room to develop flavor and texture.

A mild cheddar is aged for three months, Jeon said. A medium flavor cheese is aged six to nine months, and a sharp cheese is aged from nine months to a year, he said.

After aging, the cheese is vacuum packaged and sold through the Dairy Sales Counter in Call Hall. The cheese is also sold at Christmas time in gift boxes.

U.S. officials arrest 3rd embassy Marine

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A third Marine guard has been arrested in a burgeoning sex-and-spy scandal in the ranks of the Marine Corps' security guard force at the U.S. embassy in Moscow, the Pentagon said Tuesday.

Staff Sgt. Robert Stanley Stufflebeam, 24, of Bloomington, Ill., was taken into custody on suspicion of failing to report contacts with Soviet women while working in Moscow from May 1985 to May 1986. He was arrested Sunday at Camp Pendleton, Calif.

"Specifically, he is suspected of having associations with Soviet women on several occasions," Pentagon spokesman Robert Sims said.

Sims stressed that Stufflebeam had not been accused of espionage, as have two other former Moscow embassy guards.

Stufflebeam had commanded the two, Sgt. Clayton J. Lonetree, 25, and Cpl. Arnold Bracy, 21.

The Marines announced Monday that all 28 guards now at the embassy will be replaced in April, but it said the others are not suspected of wrongdoing.

The Marine Corps has charged that Lonetree escorted Soviet agents inside the embassy, shutting off security alarms that were tripped by the Russians, while Bracy stood guard. Lonetree also is accused of providing pictures and names of CIA agents on the embassy staff.

"The damage was probably enormous," one source, speaking anonymously, has said.

Although the Marines have refrained from making the charge publicly, Pentagon sources said both Lonetree and Bracy became involved sexually with Soviet women who worked on the embassy's staff. The Marines released the names of two women with whom the two allegedly associated but said nothing about their romantic entanglements.

Lonetree, in papers made public by his lawyer, William Kunstler, said that as an American Indian, "I guess some of my actions were based on hatred for prejudices...because of what the white man did to the Indian."

A Pentagon source, who agreed to discuss the newest development if not identified, said Stufflebeam had been arrested as a result of an effort "to pin down every contact that any guard could have had with a Soviet national."

The source said military investigators had been "appalled" to learn of the extent to which some of the guards fraternized with Soviet citizens.

Pentagon spokesman Sims said Stufflebeam is being held on suspicion of violating two military regulations — failure to report all contacts with foreign nationals, and making false official statements "during his exit debriefing indicating that no such contacts had occurred."

Blizzard havoc eases in state

By The Associated Press

HAYS — Deep snow drifts from a weekend blizzard kept ranchers from assessing their cattle losses and slowed travel Tuesday over much of western Kansas, but life was returning slowly to normal.

Schools reopened in some areas and many roads were opened to at least a single lane of traffic as sunshine and temperatures near 50 melted some of the snow.

Drifts as high as 15 feet kept U.S. 36 closed for a distance of some 100 miles from Phillipsburg to Atwood, the Kansas Highway Patrol said. Road crews continued working on U.S. 36 and other plugged routes Tuesday afternoon.

Meanwhile, Kansas Gov. Mike Hayden announced Tuesday that he would fly from Topeka to tour several western Kansas counties Wednesday afternoon to survey the damage caused by two blizzards in the space of a week.

"I want to ensure that our resources are going far enough and meeting the needs of the counties hit hardest by these recent storms," said Hayden, who was scheduled to start his tour in southwestern Kansas and wind up in the Colby area.

Hayden also planned to accompany Kansas Army National Guardsmen carrying hay by helicopter to stranded and starving cattle in much of western Kansas. The guardsmen were to move the haylift operation Wednesday to Thomas, Phillips, Rooks and Rawlins counties.

Eight Kansas Army National Guard helicopter moved hay Tuesday to isolated cattle in Decatur, Lane, Sheridan and Wichita counties. On Monday, the first day of the renewed haylift since the second blizzard hit, guardsmen delivered about 111 tons of hay to more than 8,000 head of cattle in Graham, Norton, Gove and Trego counties.

Maj. Joy Cole, a National Guard spokeswoman in Topeka, said other Guard units took maintenance crews to three remote site water wells for Garden City Tuesday and kept the armory at Phillipsburg open for a few travelers who were not able to continue their travels.

Cole said guardsmen on the haylift were hearing reports about many dead cattle in western Kansas, but there was no estimate of the loss.

"We really don't have a handle on that. A lot," she said.

Al Maddux, agricultural extension agent in Scott County, said Tuesday the after-shock of the storms may not be known entirely for up to six weeks. He said the number of dead cattle won't be known until the snow melts.

"It will be awhile before we know," Maddux said of the loss. "We've got cattle scattered and missing. We'll have to wait until some snow drifts melt before we find some of them. But we know that it's going to be real high," Maddux said.

"It was a blow to the one facet of the economy that was doing fairly well," he said. "All the other parts (of the economy) were suffering. The one bright spot was cattle. It's a real tough blow. It may be such a big blow to some people they may not be able to survive it individually."

Challenges await Big 8 teams in spring drills

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

When K-State started spring football workouts Monday, it wasn't the only Big Eight Conference school to do so — nor was it the last.

Last season's top three Big Eight teams — Oklahoma, Colorado and Nebraska — began spring drills Monday. Oklahoma State and Kansas began spring workouts March 2, and Missouri started March 23. Iowa State will commence practice April 8.

No matter when spring drills start, every school's session promises to be challenging as the Big Eight's top 11 rushers, top eight receivers and nine of the top 10 passers return from the 1986 season to vie for top spots again in 1987.

Here's a look at each conference squad and what coaches hope to accomplish during spring practice.

OKLAHOMA

The Sooners return 45 lettermen from the 1986 squad that posted an 11-1 record and won the conference championship and the Orange Bowl.

One notable Sooner — Brian Bosworth, a first-team All-American linebacker in both the Associated Press and United Press International teams — will not return for his senior year due to conflicts of interest. But Oklahoma returns a host of other standout players, however, and will no doubt be a top contender for Big Eight and national championship honors.

Keith Jackson, a 6-foot-3 tight end and consensus All-American for two years, is back to aid Oklahoma's potent offensive attack, which Coach Barry Switzer said is the Sooners' strength.

"Because of the people returning, we have a chance to be an excellent offensive team again," Switzer said. "We return every member of our line except one. We also return our quarterback and most of our running backs."

University of Oklahoma senior fullback Lydell Carr (45) could be an important factor for the Sooners if they are to climb to the top of the Big Eight conference for the fourth consecutive year.

Sooners to watch include quarterback Jamelle Holieway, the Big Eight's offensive player-of-the-year; offensive guards Mark Hutson, 6-4, 280-pounds and Anthony Phillips, 6-3, 280-pounds; linebacker Dante Jones, the Orange Bowl's most valuable player last season and fullback Lydell Carr, a 6-2 senior.

"Our spring objectives stay pretty much the same from year to year," Switzer said. "We must find replacements for our graduating seniors, get the right people in the right positions, experiment with a few position changes and, in general, work on improving every phase of our offense and defense."

COLORADO

The Buffs, 6-6 overall, were the Big Eight's runner-up in 1986. Colorado could contend for the top spot again in 1987, as it returns 44 lettermen.

Unlike Oklahoma, Colorado's strength will be its defense.

"The experience on our defense is a strength," Coach Bill McCartney said. "We have eight starters back plus two players that figure to replace two of the three we lost."

Colorado players to watch include defensive tackle Curt Koch, a 6-8, 265-pound senior who was an All-American and Outland Trophy candidate; punter Barry Helton, a two-time consensus All-American; strong safety Mickey Pruitt, who set a new defensive tackle record at Colorado with 106 last season; and halfback O.C. Oliver, a 5-11, 180-pound sophomore who was honorable mention All-Conference as a freshman.

McCartney's objective in spring drills is "to develop a two-deep on both sides of the ball."

NEBRASKA

The Cornhuskers return 45 lettermen from the 1986 squad that posted a 10-2 overall record and finished the year third in the conference standings. Coach Tom Osborne is confident about his 1987 squad despite the loss of 28 lettermen.

"Overall, our defense appears to have a lot of speed and athletic talent," Osborne said. "We feel pretty well set at the skill positions. Defensively, the front line should be outstanding."

Cornhuskers who will figure prominently in Nebraska's outcome include defensive end Broderick Thomas, a 6-2, 235-pound junior who garnered honorable mention All-American honors from AP and UPI as just a sophomore; I-back Keith "End Zone" Jones, the fastest player to ever play at Nebraska; split end Rod Smith, who led the NCAA and Big Eight in punt returns with an 18.9-yard average; defensive tackle Neil Smith, a 6-6, 255-pound senior; and defensive tackle Lee Jones, a 6-1, 245-pound senior who is Keith's older brother.

"Our main spring-practice goals are to evaluate personnel and experiment with new wrinkles in our offense and in our defense," Osborne said.

OKLAHOMA STATE

The Cowboys, 6-5 overall, ended the 1986 campaign fourth in the conference. They return 39 lettermen and 16 starters.

Coach Pat Jones said his team is young and spring drills will be very competitive.

"We'll put the squad in competitive situations and the competition factor will be greater than it has ever been," Jones said. "I see a lot of competition for positions on our offensive unit this spring. As with the defense, we'll work on developing a starting lineup."

Cowboys to watch include wide receiver Hart Lee Dykes, a 6-4, 206-pound junior who led the Big Eight in receptions with 814 yards on 60 catches; quarterback Mike Gundy, a 5-11 sophomore who set a Big Eight freshman passing record in 1986 with 1,525 yards and was named outstanding freshman quarterback in the country by The Sporting News; defensive end Jerry Deckard, a 6-2, 206-pound senior who netted 127 yards in interception returns; and running back Thurman Thomas, a 5-11, 191-pound senior who was plagued by injuries in 1986 after being named an All-American in 1985. He still led the Cowboys in rushing and was named to the All-Big Eight team.

IOWA STATE

The Cyclones, 6-5 last season, will be a young team under first-year coach Jim Walden.

"Everything will be new for us this spring," Walden said. "This will be a learning experience for both our coaching staff and our players. We're anxious to spend some quality time with our team, become familiar with their abilities and then begin building for the future."

Cylcones to watch include linebackers Chris Moore and Darrin Trieb. Moore, 6-2, 224-pounds, led the Big Eight in tackles last season with 145, including 89 solos. Trieb, 6-3, 220-pounds, is a sophomore who won a starting spot as a freshman and averaged 7.3 tackles per game.

Iowa State also has two players

Wildcats to challenge Missouri team today

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's baseball team, 10-10 overall and 0-1 in the Big Eight Conference, will play Southwest Missouri State today at Frank Myers Field. The double-header is scheduled to start at 2:30 p.m.

It will be the Wildcats' first action since Friday when they were dumped by national-powerhouse Oklahoma State, 16-6. K-State's three other games with the Cowboys were rained out Saturday and Sunday, and Tuesday's scheduled game with Creighton in Omaha, Neb., was postponed because of snow.

Southwest Missouri State, coached by Keith Guttin (five-year record: 159-68), comes into today's game with an impressive 21-5 record.

SWMSU has won the Association of Mid-Continent Universities league title the past three years.

Leading SWMSU offensively is first baseman Brian Mahaffey. After 26 games, Mahaffey leads the team in batting average (.404), home runs (6) and RBI (30). Mahaffey has a .333 career batting average.

The Sports Information Office said Tuesday that SWMSU hadn't yet named its starting pitchers. The school's top two pitchers at this stage of the season are Jim Gibbs, 5-1 with a 4.29 earned run average; and Greg Reed, 4-0, 4.13 ERA.

Gibbs, 12-2 in his career and 7-1 last year, pitched against Big Eight teams his freshman year when he was with the University of Missouri.

David Chadd still leads K-State offensively with a .450 batting average.

Dream fight featuring Leonard, Hagler is only happening 5 or 6 years too late

"Hurting people is my business."
— Sugar Ray Robinson
former welterweight and middleweight champion

TOM MORRIS
Sports Editor

Hurting people is any boxer's task, but I'm afraid Marvelous Marvin Hagler will be out to kill Sugar Ray Leonard in their fight Monday night at Caesars Palace in Las Vegas.

"Nobody is going to want Leonard anymore when I get through with him. He probably won't talk no more, might not see no more, and might not even walk no more. I like to mess up pretty faces," said Hagler in the March 30 issue of Sports Illustrated.

This might sound like any prefight hype, but Hagler is serious. Why? Leonard is everything Hagler is not.

Leonard, until the arrival of heavyweight Mike Tyson, was the fighter of the '80s. Hagler is the last of the street fighters.

In seven years as an active pro, Leonard made $48 million; Hagler, $13 million in 14 years. Hagler made $50 in his first fight; Leonard, $40,000. Leonard fought for a title in his 26th fight, while Hagler had to battle 50 opponents before getting a shot at the title.

There are other discrepancies between the two fighters, but one easily gets the picture: Leonard has always been the good guy; Hagler has been stuck wearing the black hat.

So what could ever inspire Leonard, who hasn't fought in three years and has fought only nine rounds in the last 4½ years, to step into the ring with Hagler?

"There isn't enough money in the world for me to risk my eyesight. You can't put a price tag on that," said Leonard at his first retirement speech in 1982 after suffering a detached retina in his left eye. He re-retired after defeating Kevin Howard in an unimpressive victory in 1984.

It obviously isn't financial — although the record purse of $23 million (Hagler $12 million, Leonard $11 million) couldn't hurt — it's an obsession.

"We were meant to be in the ring together. It's a bond," Leonard said in the March 30 Sports Illustrated.

"(Hagler's) that Mount Everest," he added. "He's that guy that everyone wants to climb and conquer. So far, no one has done that."

But to be quite honest, a fight that would have been a dream matchup five years ago is now nothing more than a P.T. Barnum sideshow — a sideshow that almost everyone can't help but stop to watch.

At Bushwacker's in Aggieville, more than half of the 270 seats for a closed-circuit telecast of the fight have been sold. Millions of other Americans will watch the fight in similar situations nationwide.

So it's Hagler, age 32 vs. Leonard, 30. Hagler, with a 62-2-2 record vs. Leonard, 33-1-0.

Ever since Ray "Boom Boom" Mancini killed Duk Koo Kim in a nationally televised fight, I've looked at boxing in a different light.

Oh, I'll still watch boxing, it's just that I don't enjoy it as much as I used to. It's similar to driving by a car wreck and looking to see if anyone was hurt, even though you hope no one actually was injured. And I'll probably shell out some of my hard-earned money to watch the fight, just to say I was there.

Sports Illustrated says Leonard will win. I only pray each boxer's managers and trainers, and the referee will realize, before it's too late, when Sugar Ray has had enough.

Stewart looking to mold Wildcats into national contenders

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

This year's baseball media guide is titled "Looking for the Right Combination."

This phrase applies, of course, to the baseball team as a whole, but more specifically it relates to the new members of the coaching ranks — the ones expected to find the "right combination."

Assistant Coach Jeff Stewart is one of those new coaches.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

Stewart comes to K-State after being a graduate assistant at Mississippi State for two years. At Mississippi State he was exposed to one of the best college baseball programs in the country and experienced being a part of a prominent baseball program — a prominence he said he would like to bring to K-State.

"(At Mississippi State) I was really exposed to an exciting brand of college baseball," Stewart said. "I was fortunate to work with Ron Polk, who is like the guru of college baseball coaching. We finished third in the College World Series and three of the guys from that club are in the big leagues right now."

Upon leaving Mississippi State to further pursue a career in coaching, Stewart said he did so with the belief that he could help mold another program into a national contender.

"I left (Mississippi State) with a vision of being able to do the same kind of thing at Kansas State. I think that it can still be done, but the time frame that I think it can be done in seems to grow with every obstacle," he said.

Staff/John La Barge

K-State assistant coach Jeff Stewart says he has a simple approach to coaching: nothing flashy, just fundamental baseball. Stewart was hired to his new position with the Wildcats after being a graduate assistant with the Mississippi State University baseball program for two seasons.

"First of all, it's not an overnight job. You can't just create a Top-20 program. But that's what Mike (Clark) and I are committed to and everything we do is a step toward that goal."

One obstacle that Stewart said has slowed the revamping process of the program is the defeat of the athletic fee that would have funded scholarships for non-revenue sporting events.

"That would have helped us immensely because the name of the game is athletes and right now we're not fully funded. If that thing would have gone through it would just have been our job to find the most qualified athletes to join the program. Now we're still looking for the best athletes, but we're just not going to get as many of them. The name of the game is athletes."

Once he has an athlete, Stewart has a simple approach toward coaching. He said nothing is flashy about his methods, just fundamental baseball.

What athletes do notice is his certain approach in attitude which he said he learned from coaches at Mississippi State.

"I think my exposure to college baseball at Mississippi State and the Southeast Conference for that matter, the coaches down there are of the philosophy that baseball, the game itself, supplies all the incentive needed for an athlete to perform," he said.

"Because baseball is a game of such intricate skills, especially when you talk about hitting...if you get someone too emotionally high or psyched up, the larger muscles begin to take over and with that it's tough to be successful," he added.

Stewart said he and Clark try to teach their players to relax, play the game, be prepared for both the best and the worst, and hope that as things occur they will be able to react and compete the best they can.

Competition is something that Stewart knows well, not only from his experiences with Mississippi State, but as an athlete himself. Stewart was an all-state quarterback at Elk Grove High in Chicago, Ill. In 1972 he was selected by the Chicago Sun-Times as the High School Football Player of the Year.

He went on to play flanker for the University of Illinois football team in 1975. After completing his eligibility, Stewart transferred to Northern Illinois University.

He received a bachelor of science degree in physical education from NIU in 1979. He later earned his master's degree in physical education from Mississippi State in 1985. He is married and has a 4-year-old son, Jake.

Hoosiers' party draws 15,000

By The Associated Press

BLOOMINGTON, Ind. — The pep band had already been through its routine three or four times Tuesday when the celebrating Indiana fans began lobbing rolls of toilet paper over the scoreboards high above packed Assembly Hall floor.

The NCAA champion Hoosiers' plane from New Orleans was late, but no one really cared. The party started without them.

"Hoo-siers, Hoo-siers," the crowd of about 15,000 chanted as they waited to greet the team that beat Syracuse 74-73 the previous night. When a toilet paper roll missed the scoreboard completely, the chants, inevitably, turned to "Air ball, air ball."

On the other side of the floor, draped impressively from the rafters, were the four giant red banners proclaiming Indiana's previous NCAA basketball titles. A fifth — the third for Coach Bob Knight in 16 years at Indiana — will go next to the others.

"I've had a chance to coach a lot of players and a lot of teams," Knight said to the crowd. "There's never been a team I've taken greater pride in for what it has accomplished."

In five of the Hoosiers' six victories in the tournament, they had to battle from behind. Twice, they won by one point on baskets in the closing seconds, including Monday night's comeback from eight points down that was won on tourney MVP Keith Smart's jumper with five seconds to go.

"Hopefully, this team will show you when you've got problems of your own, when things aren't going well for you, each of you can find a Keith Smart if you look around a little bit to help you," Knight said.

But Knight's philosophy for success wasn't what the screaming fans, many of whom had been waiting more than three hours, had come to hear.

They wanted their heroes. And they gave them a heroes' welcome as they climbed a platform with a sea of red at their feet.

"Weren't there any classes today?" joked reserve forward Todd Meier, one of the team's three seniors. Then he pointed across the vast arena to the four NCAA banners and said, "I'm really proud because we came back here and put another banner down there."

Meier and senior starters Steve Alford and Daryl Thomas presented the NCAA trophy to retiring Indiana President John Ryan.

"Think a minute," Ryan said to the crowd of mostly students. "You're gathering here in history. You're gathering here in the presence of five national championships."

Each player also had a chance to speak, and the biggest cheers were for Smart, because he got the winning basket, and for Alford, a two-time All-America who finished his career with a school-record 2,438 points.

The 6-foot-1 Smart, one of two junior college transfers new to the team this year, said the national championship was a "dream come true."

Big Eight

who will battle for the starting quarterback position. Brett Sadek was the No. 2 signal caller last season behind Alex Espinosa. Derek DeGennaro, a redshirt last season, was the second-team quarterback in 1985.

MISSOURI

The Tigers, 3-8 overall in 1986, won only one game in conference play. Coach Woody Widenhofer said his team will be more competitive in 1987.

"I think we'll be a better offensive football team than we've been the last several years, simply because we're going to utilize the talents that we have on hand," he said. "I really feel good about our secondary. You're going to see a much more aggressive defense."

Tigers to watch for include quarterback Ronnie Cameron, a 6-1, 191-pound junior who was hampered by injuries last season. His running ability is a major reason Missouri is switching to a triple-option attack — the Flexbone — for 1987. Cornerback Adrian Jones, 6-0, 175-pounds, was the Big Eight's defensive newcomer of the year last season as a freshman, leading the conference in interceptions.

Kansas

The Jayhawks finished 1986 in the Big Eight's cellar — winless in seven conference games. Kansas was 3-8 overall, and second-year coach Bob Valesente said his team's attitude going into spring drills this season will be a major plus for his program.

"I believe we have a good team attitude heading into spring drills," he said.

The Jayhawks almost lost a vital cog in their offense when All-Big Eight wide receiver Willie Vaughn left the team last week. He returned Tuesday. Other Jayhawks to look for include linebacker Rick Bredesen, a 6-1, 220-pound senior who led the Jayhawks in tackles last season with 106 and is fifth on KU's all-time tackling chart; offensive tackle Jim Davis, a 6-6, 260-pound senior and three-year starter; and running back Arnold Snell, a 6-0, 200-pound junior who rushed for 672 yards last season.

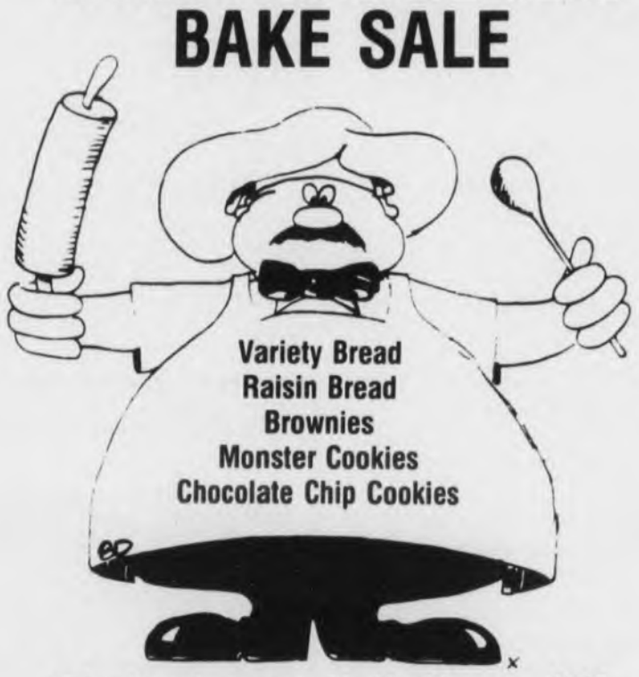
"One of our main objectives will be to improve our running game and develop a complete offensive attack," Valesente said. "We also want to establish a competitive situation for positions on our two-deep roster."

Women golfers win 1st at Missouri

By The Collegian Staff

Placing all four members among the top seven finishers, the K-State women's golf team easily won the five-team Southwest Missouri State Invitational played Monday and Tuesday in Springfield.

Senior Paige Harrison placed second individually with rounds of 43-80 for a 123 total at the par-71, 5,962-yard Greene Hills Country Club.



"It was an impressive victory," Coach Rob Sedorcek said. "We played pretty well. (Our) total was best we have shot for 18 holes this year. I hope this carries over from here."

After beginning the final 18 holes with an eight-stroke lead, the Wildcats fired a closing-round 335 for a 27-hole total of 504. K-State outdistanced second-place Southwest Missouri State by 12 strokes (516).

Finishing third was Northeast Missouri State (540), Mankato State (550) and Stephens College (621).

Taking third individually for K-State was freshman Jill Zientara at 124, senior Erin Andrew — who led the field entering the final round — tied for fifth at 128.

KSU SNAPSHOTS

A look at statistics that shape KSU

Hey, babe, let's chug

The question of whether the Union should offer beer is hotly debated. Following is the breakdown of students who support the issue:

3 percent are opposed. Their opponents refer to them affectionately as "dead heads."

97 percent are in favor. Their battle cry: "Yeah!"

Cow tippings cause severe alarm

By Chew R. Cud
KSU TODAY

Cow tippings have raised much alarm in the agricultural community as calves, heifers, steers, cows, bulls, turtles and Volkswagens have been "tipped over" by overzealous students.

In an official KSU Today survey of 3 students, more than half admitted to participating in such activities. One-third of these students said they did it because "I gotta do something now that the idiots in the legislature won't let me buy beer." (SEE RELATED GRAPH)

33 percent of the students said they do it because the "campus idiots (police, central administration or student-athletes?) won't let me go tunneling anymore."

Because cows sleep in an upright position at night, local farmers have discussed methods to alleviate the problem including severing limbs and operating all-night vegetarian taco stands in pastures.

Cow tipping results in a temporary loss of vertigo and has reportedly led to the death of a small box turtle that was crushed.

Meanwhile, "nervous and promiscuous" sheep in nearby pastures have been unaffected and are reported to wake up smiling.

New KSU mascot

After a long and often heated debate, Student Senate approved at its meeting Tuesday night the designation of the frog as the new KSUniversity mascot. Chief supporter of the measure, Ribb Itt, above and junior in pond habitation, said, "It's a wonderful, moral victory for our amphibian friends."

Bakkers to assume position of provost

KSUniversity officials announced today that a pair of emminently qualified candidates have been hired as the new provosts: Jim and Tammy Bakker.

"We were looking for someone who knows how to make a lot of money in the face of KSUniversity's current financial crisis," said a selection committee member. "The Bakkers managed $129 million in PTL money. I think we made a hell of a choice."

After the Bakkers take office in July, one major change will be the elimination of an office secretary position. The Bakkers also plan to maintain faculty quality by recommending KSU hire only people that love to teach.

"It couldn't have worked out better. Jim and Tammy needed a job, and KSU needed Jim and Tammy," said another KSUniversity official.

"KSU could really go places with a little financial help, and recent events at Oral Roberts University have shown the world just how effective TV evangelists can be at funding education."

Ks. farmers reject idea of bananas

By Froot N. Nuts
KSU TODAY

After a 25 year study on banana production in Kansas, KSUniversity researchers have determined banana farms are not feasible for Kansas farmers.

"Banana farming just ain't gonna make it here, I'm sorry to say," said researcher I.R. Smart.

Smart cited cold weather, poor soil, the ape market decline in Kansas, the lack of banana combines and no desire from farmers to produce the "damn things" as reasons why Kansas isn't a good banana state.

For his next research project, Smart plans on studying the possibilities of salt water fishing in Kansas.

"I can't believe no one has thought of this before. It will be a hell of a study and will probably take 20 or so more years," he said.

Toxic waste site prompts moving of KSUniversity

Investigation by KSU Today yields ugliness

As the result of a 2½ hour KSU Today team investigation, it was announced late Tuesday afternoon that the entire KSU campus will have to be relocated because it was errantly built directly on top of a highly toxic waste dump.

According to a top KSUniversity official, who refused to be identified pending the results of a personal examination for radiation contamination, the waste was dumped in the late 1860s, before the campus was built, by longtime Manhattan magnate Ima Glowin.

Records indicate Glowin owned a manufacturing company, Dumps R Us, and that extensive amounts of the highly toxic chemical ZT-JKI-09LK6-OHMYGOD-76ZX were dumped at the site of the current campus.

A student discovered a bubbling sledge in the Union — which has been renamed Union Carbide — parking lot as he exited his car.

"I thought somebody had just gotten sick or something, but then I thought — hey, this stuff's eatin' the soles of my shoes," said Graba Clue, freshman permanently undecided.

In light of decreasing funding by the Board of Regents and the recent identification of the University of Kansas as the state's flagship institution, it is believed that top KSUniversity officials will decree KSU a non-institution in a brief ceremony in the sledge-filled Union Carbide Courtyard this afternoon. Then, students will be urged to finish their education at KU or turn to a life of crime, whichever they find most appealing.

KU officials had no comment, but one student was reported to have said, "I don't think they allow farm animals in our dorms."

Merchant offers mall alternative

Manhattan contractor Harry B. Hind is basically saying he's tired. Tired of malls, that is.

"Malls are all right for the variety of shops they have to offer, but you have to walk around so damn much to get to where you want to go," he said. "I like things close together — where you can get to them easily."

Hind has begun construction near KSU of a combination bar, roller skating rink and bowling alley — all in one compact building.

"Let's face it, bowling is a pretty boring sport. Here, if a bowler chugs a few brews, maybe he can liven things up by aiming for skaters."

Hind has other ideas in the works as well, including:

— Combination car wash/church. "Bring your convertible in for a wash, leave the top down and get the baby baptized at the same time."

3d installment of KSU Today in-depth report

Legislators and concerned Kansans will go head to head today in a hearing about storage of radioactive waste and whether the state should remain in the Central Interstate Waste Compact — a body formed to decide where a facility for its five member states should be located.

Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana are the states in the compact.

Activists who want Kansas to pull out of the compact and regulate radioactive waste more stringently are expected to focus on three bills. Senate Bill 114 asks for a withdrawal of the state from the compact and appears in conjunction with House Bill 2108, which would repeal a law allowing shallow burial of radioactive waste.

Opposing both is Senate Bill 406, which would establish a Kansas waste disposal authority but would allow for the state's continued compliance with the compact.

The last bill was drafted by Rep. Merrill Wertz, R-Junction City, who supports Kansas' agreement with the compact.

Kansans who oppose the compact gained ground two weeks ago when a federal agency revealed that the study done on facility site selection was found to be seriously misleading.

Dames Moore, the Texas-based company hired by the compact to select suitable sites in the five-state area, reported Oklahoma as being the smallest producer of radioactive waste.

The company listed this as the reason they did not include Oklahoma from site selection. But the National Water Center questioned the assessment and set out to prove an Oklahoma producer of radioactive fuel and subsidiary of Kerr-McGee, Sequoya Fuels, Inc., produced more than the 15,000 cubic feet of radioactive waste Dames Moore claimed in its report.

A lawsuit filed against Sequoyah by the center on Dec. 22, 1986 was settled in the center's favor nearly two weeks ago. Evidence from the case proved Sequoyah did indeed produce more than Dames Moore claimed.

Reports indicate there is no exact estimate of how much radioactive waste the company produces annually. But in a two-year span it stored 294,000 cubic feet and could have dumped 312,000 pounds of uranium into the Arkansas River, an act a Nuclear Regulatory Commission permit allows it to do.

Other reports from the lawsuit inquiry indicate Oklahoma has approximately 2.5 million cubic feet of radioactive waste awaiting proper disposal. Oklahoma's waste would half fill the commission's proposed facility, which is scheduled to contain 5 million cubic feet at the end of 30 years.

The Dames Moore report was also heavily criticized by the Kansas Geological Survey Department for inaccurate assessments of the sites selected.

Geoffrey Dewan, an activist from Frankfort, said members of his group plan to attend the hearing with their children. He said he wants the legislators to look into the faces of the next generation and explain the radioactive waste policy to them.

"It's a 'heads I win, tails you lose' situation," Dewan said. "The (political) climate in Kansas is concerned, fearful. The politicians don't realize that they are on the brink of a revolution.

"Furley (dump) raised the people's awareness of the problem, but radioactivity is a lot easier to get a handle on. It's scary," Dewan said.

Funding exceeds records

The KSU Foundation set a one-month record when nearly $4 million in alumni contributions were received during December 1986, said Les Longberg, KSU Foundation controller.

"December is traditionally our largest month," Longberg said, however, interest in the revised tax laws governing charitable contributions may have helped lead to the record month.

The highest tax rate on a charitable donation was reduced from 50 percent to 38.5 percent on Jan. 1, and this may have contributed to the increase in donations, he said. The tax rate will decrease to 33 percent in 1988.

"We don't feel the new laws will be detrimental to our program," Longberg said. "Most of our contributors are not motivated by tax interests, but rather by genuine philanthropic interest."

Contributions for December totaled $3,945,767 in cash, real estate, securities and gifts. Gifts have included computers, artwork and musical instruments.

The Foundation received 105 donations, each with a value of $5,000 or more, including one gift worth $1.09 million. The total value of these 105 gifts was more than $3 million.

The 1986 total is up from the $2,177,000 received in December 1985 and $1,425,000 in December 1984. The total for the six-month period ending last December was $6,713,880.

This is all part of a tremendous increase in funds the KSU Foundation has seen during the past decade, he said.

"Ten years ago our total endowment totaled about $12 million," Longberg said. "It now exceeds $70 million."

Longberg cites a more aggressive approach toward fund-raising as the major reason for the increase. The Foundation has been especially active among members of the President's Club, those who donate $10,000 or more.

"(Alumni donors) who have money are more effective at raising money than anyone on our staff," Longberg said. "They are just better able to convince others to give."

Longberg also said an increase of student involvement has contributed to the Foundation's growth.

"Student involvement has increased greatly, both through the telefund and through the KSU Student Foundation," he said.

The Foundation is currently involved in the nationwide telefund involving students and faculty.

"Calling began Feb. 1, and each of the six colleges completing its telefund has achieved a record pledge total," Longberg said in a press release. "Alumni participation is also up dramatically, which is significant because Kansas State University has one of the highest percentages of alumni contributors among publicly assisted colleges and universities.

Yemi Ogunrinola, graduate student in food science, plays a sekere, a gourd wrapped with beads, Wednesday in the Union Courtyard. Ogunrinola, a native of Nigeria and part of a three-man band celebrating International Week, asked the crowd to dance: "Music has a therapeutic effect; shake it and boogie."

The rhythmic thumping of drums beckoned people to the Union Courtyard during the noon hour Wednesday as The Nigerian Student Union presented live African music by the Yemi Ogunrinola Drummers as part of International Week.

"The drums we used are owned by Phil Royster (professor of English), so they are not really what is used at home," said Yemi Ogunrinola, graduate student in food science and member of the Yoruba tribe in Nigeria.

"The drums at home have a better sound, but here we improvise due to the number of people involved and the instruments we have," he said.

"African music has a rumba sound. When people shake it gives us motivation."

Royster, coordinator of the American Ethnic Studies Program and member of the group, said he has been with the group for about a year and has played the drums since 1958.

The patterns of music played in the Union were from the Yoruba tribe of Nigeria in West Africa.

"These rhythms would be played in celebrations," Royster said. Such celebrations are weddings and christenings which call for a rumba sound, Ogunrinola said.

"We started playing because we found out that Royster had the drums after someone saw him performing in the park," Ogunrinola said.

One type of instrument used was igbins, or open ended log drums. The igbin drums stand on three legs roughly carved out of the bottom of the drum with decorative figures and designs on the sides. Often the entire shape of the drum is adapted to the human figure.

These drums are sacred to Orishanla ("the great deity") translated as the "king of the white cloth," who may be described as the deity of whiteness. Many of the things associated with his ritual are white.

Professors debate salmonella issues

By STACEY CAMPBELL

Salmonella, a bacteria that lives off a host, "is literally everywhere," said Frank Cunningham, professor of animal sciences and industry and food science specialist.

"It's nothing new. It's as old as livestock, and all animal products are subject to salmonella," Cunningham said.

"Salmonella is a bacterium that is best described as an obligate parasite — it requires some sort of animal to serve as its host," said James Urban, associate professor of biology.

"Salmonella bacteria produces a toxin called endotoxin, which produces symptons of shock and fever in humans," he said.

Cunningham and Urban differ in the extent to which they believe the public should be concerned about the bacteria.

"The general public doesn't need to worry about salmonella at all," Cunningham said. He said he has worked with the poultry processing industry, and "salmonella is not as frequently encountered as some might think."

"We have a course called Microbiology of Foods, and the students are supposed to isolate organisms," he said. "In the stores here, they have not had a lot of luck in getting salmonella from chickens."

Urban said he believes there is an inherent risk in eating food contaminated with salmonella.

"There is a greater risk of eating food with salmonella than eating foods with a microorganism other than salmonella or no microorganism at all," Urban said.

Students in Urban's general biology class are assigned to isolate organisms from nature. In this class experiment, "a significant number of students have purchased chickens and isolated salmonella," he said.

"Considerably more than half the time we find salmonella, but we design our experiment to look for salmonella (bacteria)," he said.

The salmonella bacteria is very heat sensitive. The U.S. Department of Agriculture's pasteurization temperature to kill the salmonella bacteria is 140 F (60 C), Cunningham said.

"Unless people eat a hell of a lot of raw chicken, they don't have to worry about salmonella infection — and I don't know who eats raw chicken," Cunningham said.

Bills require further study

By JONIE R. TRUED

Two bills affecting student state residency and the state work study program received final approval from the House today and will proceed directly to Gov. Mike Hayden, while two more controversial bills, concerning tuition and open admissions, were returned to interim committees for further study.

The two bills not receiving much success were the tuition bill (H. 2383) and the open admissions bill (H. 2384). Both were introduced by Robert Vancrum, R-Overland Park.

By a vote of 66-49, House members recommended the tuition bill to the Legislative Educational Planning Committee, an ongoing interim body. The bill would set minimum levels for state university tuition and require tuition increase be held on the same level at each institution.

The bill, if approved in its original form, is expected to affect K-State severely.

"The bill was improved and had some positive aspects, but the whole thing was still very negative," said Mark Tallman, legislative director for Associated Students of Kansas in Topeka.

Tallman said by referring the bill to an interim committee, aspects of TOPEKA — A Senate committee decided Wednesday to determine ways other states have studied proposed changes in their post-secondary education systems before recommending how Kansas should review its system.

Members of the Senate Education Committee said they favor an interim study instead of acting on a House-passed bill that would change how higher education is governed in Kansas by placing community colleges and Washburn University of Topeka under the supervision of the Kansas Board of Regents.

The committee chairman, Sen. Joseph Harder, R-Moundridge, and Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, have proposed setting up a special task force this summer and hiring a consultant from outside the state to consider changes in the education section of the Kansas Constitution.

"I would like to have some budget to pull in some people from out of state to do it right," Harder said.

But some committee members suggested asking the Legislative Educational Planning Commission, which meets between sessions, to study the question.

"We already have a committee in place to do these kinds of things,"

Pope calls for peace in Chile

SANTIAGO, Chile — Pope John Paul II called for the victory of peace over violence as he arrived Wednesday in this nation he has called "dictatorial." Police used tear gas to disperse crowds pushing toward him.

President Augusto Pinochet, the leader of Chile's right-wing military regime, met the pontiff at the airport and told him the country is a victim of a foreign campaign of "hate, lies and the culture of death."

"God bless Chile," the pope said, declaring he wanted Chile to work for "forgiveness and reconciliation, with the victory of good over evil, peace over violence."

Later the police used tear gas to disperse crowds trying to push past government cordons. Policemen ripped away a sign held by a young man that asked in Spanish, "Holy father, what is freedom like?"

British keep ban on death penalty

LONDON — The House of Commons voted by a wide margin Wednesday against restoring the death penalty, which was abolished in Britain 18 years ago.

Lawmakers voted 342-230 to defeat a resolution that would have brought back capital punishment for "evil murders." It was the seventh failure to reinstate the death penalty since it was officially abolished in 1969.

All parties in the 650-member Commons allowed their members a free vote, without the customary demand to follow a party position, and a loud cheer filled the packed chamber when the result was announced.

Law-and-order campaigners, spurred by a wave of public revulsion over a terrorist attack and the murder of a policeman, launched the latest bid to restore the death penalty. They argued it would deter would-be murderers.

But Home Secretary Douglas Hurd, backed by senior opposition leaders, won the day after he warned: "Return of the death penalty will not help to catch murderers, convict murderers, or retain respect for the political system."

Bill requires regulation of smoking

TOPEKA — Owners of retail stores, restaurants and proprietors of public buildings would be required to regulate smoking and protect the rights of non-smokers under a bill given first-round approval Wednesday in the Senate.

Final action is scheduled Thursday on the bill, which already has passed the House. It was requested by the Kansas Medical Society and supported by a number of anti-smoking groups, including the American Lung Association of Kansas.

"This bill covers all public buildings, including state buildings," said Sen. Eric Yost, R-Wichita. "In the absence of a sign permitting smoking, you should presume you're not supposed to smoke."

The bill would not necessarily prohibit smoking in public places. It simply requires smoking to be regulated and confined to specifically designated areas. The proprietor of each building would designate the smoking areas.

Originally, the bill would have banned smoking anywhere in hospitals and other health institutions. However, that provision was struck by the House, despite complaints from some that smoking should not be allowed in hospitals.

Violating the smoking restrictions would be a misdemeanor, punished by a $20 fine.

Reagan agrees to trade meetings

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration, while standing fast to its plans for sanctions on Japanese electronics imports, has agreed to a Japanese request for "emergency consultations" in the intensifying dispute over computer chips, U.S. officials said Wednesday.

A team of Japanese trade specialists will arrive in Washington on Friday for negotiations with their counterparts in the departments of State, Commerce and office of U.S. trade representative, the officials said.

The semiconductor talks, to get under way in earnest on Monday, will be followed later in the week with meetings in Washington among higher-level trade officials of both nations, government spokesmen said.

However, U.S. officials held out little hope that the dispute over semiconductor pricing practices could be resolved in time to avert the proposed duties on $300 million in Japanese products from taking effect on April 17.

Officials seek lawyer in spy case

WASHINGTON — U.S. investigators are seeking to question a Washington lawyer with dual Israeli-U.S. citizenship in connection with the Pollard spy affair, diplomatic and administration sources said Wednesday.

The attorney, who was identified as Harold Katz, allegedly allowed his Washington apartment to be used by Jonathan Jay Pollard's handlers to photocopy U.S. military documents that Pollard smuggled from his job as a Navy analyst, said an administration source, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

A diplomatic source, who also demanded anonymity, said Katz, who took Israeli citizenship in 1972, also is suspected by U.S. authorities of being involved in payments to Pollard.

Israel is resisting U.S. efforts to question Katz, who also has a home in Tel Aviv, the Israeli capital, the administration source said, adding that Katz is in Israel now and that the government does not want him to leave.

Lawyers support surrogacy laws

HACKENSACK, N.J. — A judge's upholding of a surrogate parent contract in New Jersey after an Indiana judge ruled one invalid last year heightens the need for laws to clarify the sensitive issue, lawyers said Wednesday.

"Surrogacy has potentially devastating civil liberties implications for all parties involved. We have to proceed very carefully and very thoughtfully," said Susan Sangree, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union's Reproductive Freedom Project in New York City.

Superior Court Judge Harvey R. Sorkow's 121-page decision in the "Baby M" case Tuesday granted custody of the year-old girl known as Baby M to her father, William Stern. It denied parental rights to Mary Beth Whitehead, who had agreed to bear the child for Stern and his wife, Elizabeth, via artificial insemination. Mrs. Stern adopted the baby Tuesday.

Attorneys for Mrs. Whitehead, who had changed her mind after agreeing to a $10,000 surrogate contract, filed for a stay of the decision Tuesday. They said the case probably will be appealed directly to the New Jersey Supreme Court, and that arguments are expected within four months.

Sorkow's strongest message, legal experts said, was a call for help from the nation's legislatures.

No state regulates surrogate parenting. Sixteen states have delved into the issue, with bills either pending or defeated in their Legislatures.

Senate upholds Reagan's highway bill veto

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate tentatively sustained President Reagan's veto of an $88 billion highway bill on a 65-35 vote on Wednesday, handing him a tenuous victory in a high-stakes political showdown with the Democratic majorities of Congress.

Senate GOP Leader Bob Dole declared, "We've won fair and square," but after several hours of behind-the-scenes maneuvering, Democrats sought a second vote and appeared confident they would prevail.

Their hopes for victory hinged on Democratic first-termer Terry Sanford of North Carolina, who initially supported the veto, but then said, "I would vote to override" on a second ballot.

Sanford said he was satisfied his first vote had demonstrated the president was still an effective leader, and added he was prepared to switch because an alternative highway bill prepared by the White House would mean less funding for his state than the vetoed measure.

"Let's just say I was slightly confused," he said of a series of events on the Senate floor in which he initially voted present, then returned to the front of the chamber a few moments later to change his vote to sustain the veto.

Sanford's turnabout triggered a legislative showdown with Republicans, who delayed a second vote to give the president and senior aides time to find an offsetting vote. "I'm not convinced we can't find another vote on the Republican side," Dole said.

Reagan, flying home from Philadelphia, remained aboard Air Force One for about 12 minutes after he landed at Andrews Air Force Base to make calls to senators, White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said.

Later, arriving at the White House, the president declined to answer questions about the Senate showdown. "I don't have any answers now," he said.

In the meantime, Vice President George Bush and Transportation Secretary Elizabeth Dole worked in separate offices just off the Senate floor, seeking converts to Reagan's cause.

"It is a very critical vote for Ronald Reagan," Dole said in a final, appeal for support before the initial roll call. "This may determine the strength of this presidency for the next 21 months."

The maneuvering only served to heighten the stakes in the politically charged showdown that the GOP sought to turn into a test of Reagan's prestige after months of buffetting by the Iran-Contra affair.

On the initial vote, 52 Democrats and 13 Republicans voted to override Reagan. There were 33 Republicans and Sanford voting to sustain the veto. Senate Majority Leader Robert Byrd, D-W.Va., switched his vote at the last minute to sustain the veto in a parliamentary maneuver that enabled him to demand the second roll call.

It takes a two-thirds vote of both houses to override a veto. The House easily overrode the president on Tuesday, 350-73, but Reagan and top administration officials have lobbied strenuously in recent days in hopes of sustaining his position in the Senate.

Reagan issued his veto last week.

Speech club excels

Students bound for contest

By DORI WITHERS
Collegian Reporter

Five students will have "high hopes" as they travel to San Diego State University to compete in the American Forensics Association National Individual Events Tournament April 11-13.

Competitors are Brad Atchison, junior in speech; John Mertz, senior in secondary education; Vincent Bly, senior in theater; Lara Dillinger, freshman in secondary education; and Andrea Jarvis, freshman in modern languages.

The members of Speech Unlimited qualified for 10 positions in the national competition by either placing first, second or third in an event at three meets during the year, or placing in the top 10 percent in an event at the district tournament.

The district tournament in March at Nacadogches, Texas, was especially fun, Atchison said.

"Everyone was so relaxed. It was really exciting because everyone did so well," he said.

Four entries qualified for the national competition from the individual performances at the district tournament. Bly placed first in dramatic interpretation, Mertz took third in the after dinner speaking, and Atchison and Dillinger were fifth in a dramatic duo interpretation. Jarvis previously qualified for the national competition by placing in three tournaments earlier in the year.

Bly and Mertz have competed in national competition twice before, and Atchison was a participant last year.

"If we place we'll be ecstatic, but if we don't it's still OK because it's a learning experience," Atchison said. "You get to see people who are very, very good and you are exposed to new material."

Atchison said the speech club is a fun way to meet people.

"We've really become good friends with other schools, and it's fun to get together after the meets to relax and have fun," he said. Club members played basketball with friends from other schools at a local church one evening during the district tournament, Atchison said.

Competitive aspects are always present, but the friendships and social aspects are much more prominent and special, he said.

"I feel very privileged to be going (to the national competition)," Jarvis said. "We have a lot of talented people, and I feel lucky to have the opportunity to go with them."

As a freshman, Jarvis said she is learning a great deal from more experienced members.

"You see what they do and how they interact with others and learn from them," she said. "We spend so much time together that we're kind of like a family. They're very supportive and encouraging."

After being a member on her high school debate team, Jarvis said she attended a forensics workshop the summer before she came to the University. The experience helped her decide to join the speech club.

For Bly, speech started in high school as well.

"I got into (speech) in high school by accident and ended up winning first place (in an event) at nationals," he said.

Bly said his favorite event is poetry because it deals with topics about which he cares.

"This year I'm going to win first," he said. "That's my goal."

"Concerned Poets on the MOVE," the piece with which Bly placed first at the district competition, deals with a radical "back-to-nature, organic group" victimized for being different, he said. Based on a true incident, police in Philadelphia bombed the group's small community about three years ago to gain entrance. Eleven people were killed from the bomb blast.

"Sometimes it's hard to hold back the tears because some of the material is so tragic," Bly said.

Allocation bill faces Senate vote

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate will vote on a bill tonight allowing special allocation to Student Governing Association to cover the remaining cost for the 1987-88 SGA election.

The bill states the total cost for the election was $381.17, however, the SGA budget allocation was only $300.

Senate will also vote on whether a commission will be established to review SGA constitution and bylaws revisions.

Justin Sanders, graduate student in physics and sponsor of the bill, said the committee is needed to relieve some of the work currently done by the Senate Operations Committee.

In other action, Senate will hear first reading of a bill to make uniform the student fee change policy. If this bill passes next week, all additions and changes to fees assessed to students over which SGA has jurisdiction will be discussed during one Senate meeting.

The bill states the meeting will be the second Thursday in February, five weeks before fee changes are due to the Kansas Board of Regents.

Also to be discussed during first readings will be a revision to the SGA bylaws concerning the wording of Senate's power over the Collegian. The bill states the present bylaws imply SGA has control over the Collegian's content.

In addition, Kent Bradley, junior in nutrition science and student body president, will seek approval of his appointments to the presidential cabinet.

Other appointments on the agenda for approval include Jennifer Leeds, sophomore in political science, as the new Associated Students of Kansas campus director and Ed Frankenberg, sophomore in electrical engineering, as assistant campus director.

Senate commendations to K-State's men's and women's basketball teams and Washburn University men's basketball team are also on the agenda for the meeting at 7 p.m. Union Big Eight Room.

Also being commended is Phil Anderson, temporary instructor of speech, and his public speaking classes. The resolution states the classes are to be commended for stimulating interest and awareness of issues affecting the University community.

Drunk driving threat justifies fake ID policy

Last week, four K-State freshmen from Wichita were arrested for producing false identifications. Authorities say the four produced Kansas driver's license replicas using falsified information.

The crime of which they will be formally charged is a felony. Although a jail term is unlikely, it certainly is a possibility.

Since all are first-time offenders, they will probably get only a judicial slap on the hand. These men are not typical felony offenders.

However, that doesn't lessen the severity of their indiscretion. Producing false IDs is a serious crime. Authorities are taking a no-nonsense approach to the problem, and justifiably so.

The obscenity of drunken driving statistics warrants such a seriousness. Underage purchase and consumption of alcohol often leads to drunk driving, and drunk driving leads to death.

In many states, the falsification of identification is a flourishing business. Unfortunately, as such businesses flourish so do the grisly statistics from the toll inflicted by drinking drivers.

This crackdown should produce a message for all counterfeit ID producers: Society will not tolerate fraudulent practices that directly lead to deaths.

Nuclear waste needs above-ground storage

The disposal problem of low-level radioactive waste created throughout the nation has become a heated debate recently.

We have two possibilities — above-ground disposal and underground disposal. Each has advantages and disadvantages, however, one solution seems more dangerous to the human race than the other.

Underground disposal of low-level radioactive waste presents a major problem with underground water. Water is a necessity of life, and underground burial endangers the water supply's purity.

The world's major source of drinking water is from the ground; without this, human life would have a hard time existing as we know it today.

With underground burial, the site of the disposal is not accessible for monitoring. The only way to monitor an underground site is to test the water in a three-mile radius of the site. If levels of radiation are detected at this point it is too late, the dangerous material is already out and presenting a dangerous problem for and to the public.

Above-ground disposal facilities are considered easier to monitor than underground ones. Barrels containing the waste, the building and the surrounding area can be checked every day for levels of radioactive matter with a Geiger counter.

Some officials argue that above-ground facilities are susceptible to weather conditions. Buildings can be built which easily protect waste materials from rain, snow, sleet and hail, and buildings have been built that survive earthquakes.

Keeping in mind the essential nutrients of life — an underground burial site jeopardizes all humans, not to mention all living things of this planet.

Contra policy reaches insane obsession level

The Reagan administration has finally stepped across the line separating sound policy from insane obsession.

Concerning its policy toward Nicaragua, Assistant Secretary of State Elliott Abrams stated this past week that the administration was seriously considering raising its $105 million request for the Contra rebels by as much as 20 percent.

"What we did, really, was to take the $100 million for this year and give it about 5 percent for inflation. But certainly we're taking a look at the program, 115, 120, 125 (million). Those are reasonable ballpark figures," Abrams said.

One would think, after all of the recent revelations about Iranian arms sales money being diverted to the Contras, that the administration would give up its bankrupt policy of trying to overthrow the Nicaraguan government. Polls before the Iran-Contra scandal showed two-thirds of Americans opposed aid, and opposition has increased greatly since then.

When are the leaders of this country going to pay attention to the wishes of the people? They should have to persuade a majority of Americans to support the policy before they start implementing it. This is a democracy and the representatives in Washington are supposed to represent the people, not the president.

Nicaragua has become an obsession with Reagan, a dangerous obsession that could pull the United States into another Vietnam. When is he going to realize the Nicaraguan people, after fighting to free themselves from the U.S.-supported Somoza dictatorship, are not going to accept anything the U.S.-supported Contra rebels have to offer? You cannot impose a government on people who don't want it. The administration should think again before continuing this folly.

Parents get in the way

Folks' advice hinders job hunt

RON HONIG
Collegian Columnist

"Have you been sending out more resumes?" the mother asked.

"No, not yet. I've been busy this week so I haven't got around to it," answered the woman's son. "I still havn't heard from that ski equipment manufacturer yet. They said they would be calling this week. I don't know what the deal is."

"Well, I don't know why you want to go off and take a job with them," the lady blurted. "I thought you wanted to be an architect."

"I do, but this sounds like a fun job, something interesting to do for a while."

"I think you should get a job in your major. Why did you go to school all these years if you didn't want to..."

"If I want to work with this company for a while," the young man interrupted, "I should have the right to do it, don't you think? It's my life."

Conversations such as these go on all too often among college students and their parents. At that age, students are ready to move out of their parents homes and into a new career. Problems sometimes arise when decisions need to be made. It's not what decision to make, but who is going to make it?

Naturally parents' attitudes vary a great deal, but I think each parent has his or her version of rearing children and his or her expectations for them. This places a heavy burden on the child if the person's expectations of themselves don't match with their folks. The child is then forced to make a decision: Do they follow their parents wishes or strive for the career they are interested in?

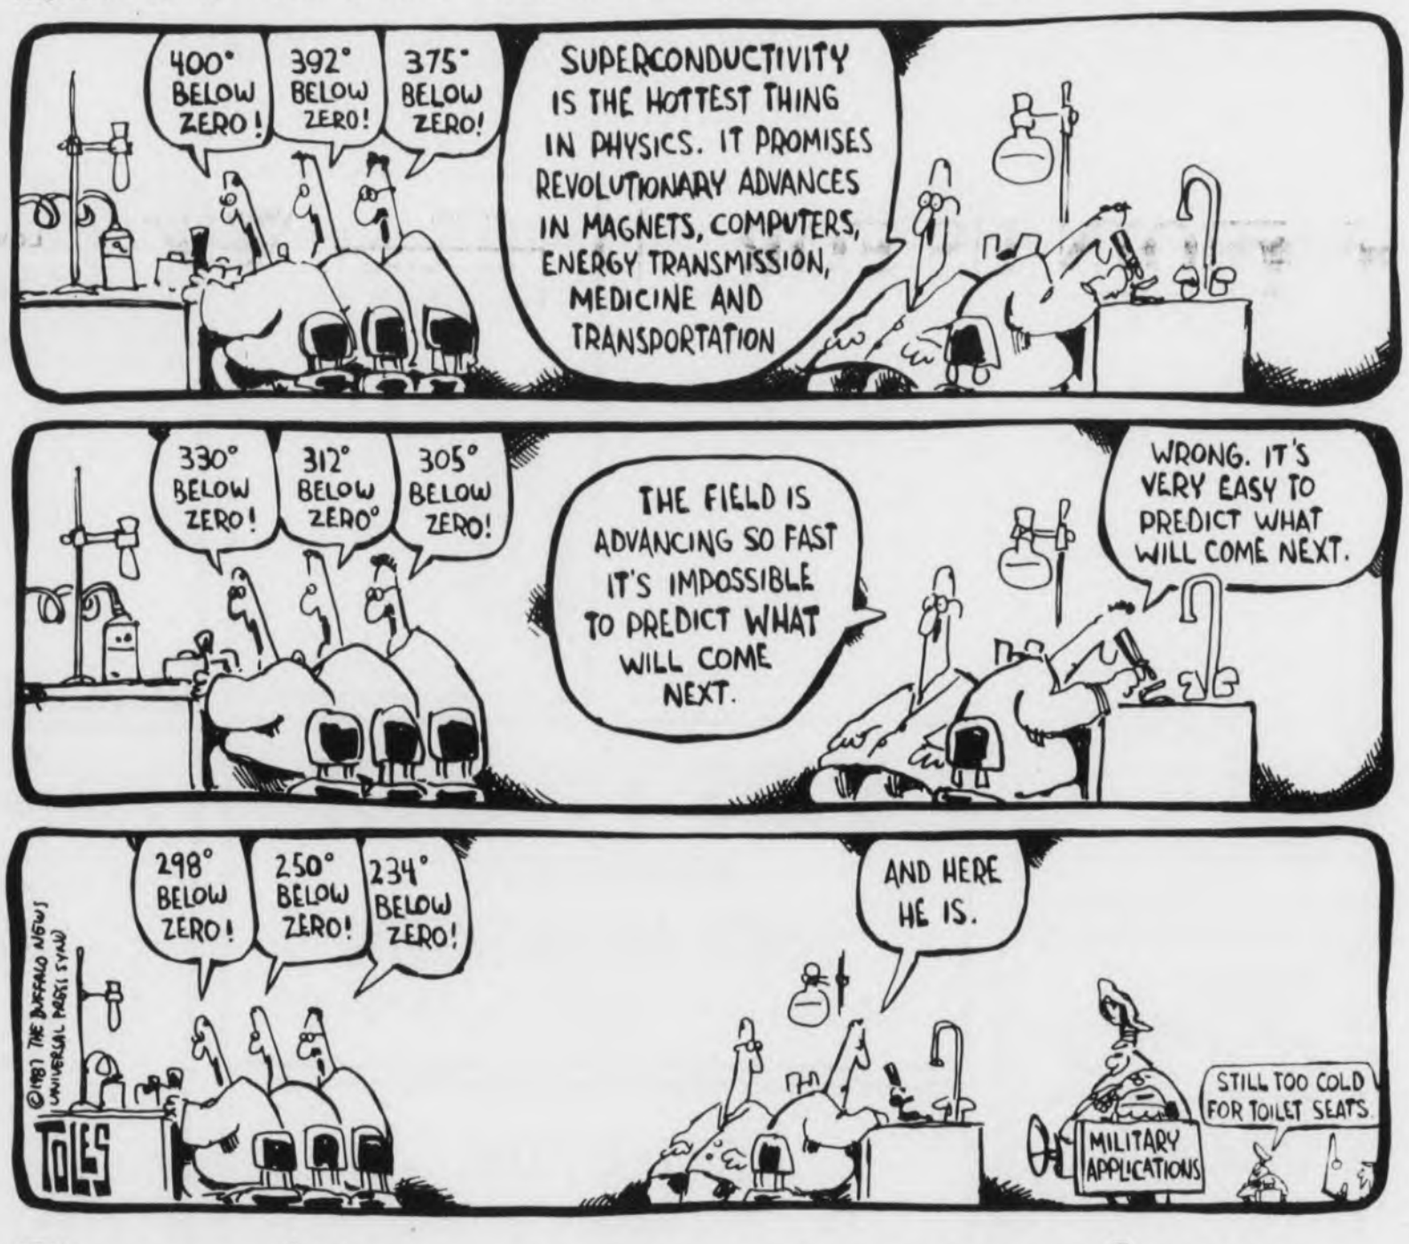
Most people have great respect for their parents and thus find it very difficult to turn down advice or go against their wishes. Few bonds are stronger than the bonds we share with our parents. Being the people who raised us, they know almost everything about us. They have seen us go through every change in development. We're their little project.

In a sense, they own us, or are at least responsible for our actions. Therefore, parents feel we must conform to the image they have of us. We are imagined growing up in certain way, achieving goals and reaching heights seen as prestigious to our folks. When we take a route different than the one purposed by our mom and dad, they feel we are going astray.

Maybe it is not their fault. Maybe after all the years of being responsible for us, they cannot just let go. The folks feel they are still responsible for us and the type of career we choose. They feel if we end up in a dead-end, low-wage job or we get stuck in a career we do not like, it is their fault. What our parents must realize is that giving advice is all they should be responsible for. I very much welcome advice from my parents because I know they have more experience than I. The final decision, though, must be ours.

Parents may find it hard to turn the decision-making over to their son or daughter because they don't feel they have the experience to handle the task. What they might not be able to explain is where the person is supposed to gain experience in decision-making and selecting employment. It took me a long time to convince my mom and dad that time does not equal experience, that waiting only puts you behind the rest of the people in the job market.

I can see how parents may feel you are not mature enough to be responsible. As students, many of us, including myself, still equate school with having fun. Not that I think the fun stops after graduation, but in many cases that is true. Our parents may get a bad feeling about us when they hear about something we have done such as sky diving, white-water rafting or participation in a drinking contest. For some though, even sharpening your pencil during class may be daring.



It's not a good feeling to come home at 2 in the morning and find a note on your desk reading, "Your dad called at 8:30, call him back tonight." I can see how they may get bad connotations about college life.

Some parents may be envious of their sons or daughters having a chance at a fresh start, a chance to choose a career instead of having to take whatever is available at the time. These parents may put pressure on their children to go into a field the parent wanted to go into, but never had the chance. In a way, the parent wants the student to live the life they weren't able to.

Possibly our parents are just being over protective. They mean well and are just trying to help. To us though it seems they are only interfering. I wish I knew the answers to problems between parents and kids. My guess is the answer has something to do with simple communication. I've never been able to talk to my parents that well and have just let feelings slide, never expressing them. This is probably the worst thing that can happen, the parents not really knowing your feelings thus being left to guess at them.

If you let your parents make you mad, the decision you make may not be the best either. When I get mad, I have a tendency to choose the opposite of that preferred by the other party. This may cause you to make a choice with a biased opinion.

If only parents could see the other side of the coin. If only they could realize that we want to make the decision because we are the ones who have to live with it. Our parents aways have the "I told you so" option in case things go wrong.

Committee requests members

MICHELLE BENOIT
Guest Columnist

I promise this won't be a gung-ho student government article because I know most of you would immediately turn to the crossword puzzle. You may anyway, but please don't, because this is an important issue that affects you.

At the last Student Senate meeting, a Representation Ad Hoc Committee was established to evaluate our current method of representation, which is now determined by a person's college affiliation. The bill which establishes the committee is to examine the current representation of the student body and research any changes which could enhance representation.

The issue was first related back in October, when a bill was introduced before the 1986-87 Senate to answer the question of representation through a student referendum. After passage of the bill, it was vetoed by our student body president. Consequently, that same bill could not find the needed two-thirds support from Senate to override the veto. However, the issue was certainly not dead.

Two groups were formed to evaluate the representation issue further. One group consisted of a number of concerned students who were determined to raise enough signatures to override the president's veto. After raising only about 1,000 signatures, the campaign to override the veto through a petition had failed.

The second group pursued another avenue by presenting another bill to Senate which would have established a very similar Representation Ad Hoc Committee. This bill was sponsored by the 1986-87 student body president and his cabinet, but it failed passage in Senate also. As far as student government was concerned, the representation issue was officially a dead one.

Contrary to the inaction of student government during the past couple of months in evaluating the representation issue, the issue has certainly never died. This issue has been on the minds of a number of students ever since it was initially raised, and I'm certain it will continue to be of importance until the newly formed Representation Ad Hoc Committee finds some answers.

The bill calls for an 11-member committee, three student senators and eight at-large members. A broad representation of students is to constitute the committee. It is for this reason that I am writing this column. We need your help in filling these positions.

If you are concerned about the way you as a student are represented in your student governing body, then please apply for one of the eight positions. If you sincerely feel you could serve as an unbiased committee member in making such a decision about the representation issue, then please apply. Even if you usually don't give a damn about what we do in Senate, but feel you could in some way contribute to the representation committee, please consider applying.

We need your help. We as current senators have inherent biases, since we have already been elected by the current method of representation and cannot be truly objective.

I hope that through this column we will receive a number of qualified applicants. The time commitment on the committee will be the rest of this semester until the end of September. This is a very important issue. It could have a very significant effect on Senate, or it could make no difference at all.

It's all up to you.

Michelle Benoit is a junior in agricultural economics and Senate chairwoman.

Researchers strive to eliminate deadly virus

Disease transmits through fluid exchanges

Editor's Note: This is the fourth in a daily five-part series dealing with AIDS. On Friday, the social aspects of AIDS will be examined and a speech by Jeff Martin, a psychologist from New York, on the psychological aspects of AIDS will be covered.

The reality of AIDS

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

The AIDS virus cannot be contracted through hugging, massages, sexual fantasies and anything "kinky that does not involve the exchange of bodily fluids," said Eric Schuman, physician assistant and chairman of the board of directors of the Topeka AIDS project.

The AIDS virus can only be transmitted by introduction into the bloodstream, he said to an audience of about 15 Wednesday night in Denison Hall.

"There's nothing that's better understood (by experts) about this disease than the means of transmission," he said.

He said the most common ways to transmit the virus is from a mother to unborn child, sexual transmission and the use of dirty needles in intravenous drug use.

"An intravenous drug addict who gives his used needle to a buddy to be reused is one of the best ways of transmission because it goes directly into the bloodstream," he said.

He said the most dangerous sexual practices are anal and vaginal intercourse because semen and blood have the highest concentrations of the AIDS virus. The virus can enter the bloodstream without any apparent bleeding.

"During intercourse...there is microscopic bleeding," he said.

When latex condoms are properly used they can prevent the spread of the AIDS virus, he said. Schuman explained the correct procedure for using condoms.

The condom must be placed on an erect penis. There should be space at the tip of the condom to provide a place for semen to deposit, he said. The condom should then be rolled down to the base of the penis. Before withdrawal from the partner, the condom must be held at the base to prevent semen from spilling out, he said. Condoms should never be reused, he said.

While there have been no documented cases of AIDS virus transmission through swallowing semen, the practice should be avoided, Schuman said.

Oral-to-anal sex may also be a means of transmission, he said. The virus has been detected in saliva, although no cases of AIDS have been attributed through kissing. Schuman said the possibility of the AIDS virus being transferred by sweat or tears is miniscule.

"The risk of that sort of transmission is just nil," he said.

Schuman said a Red Cross pamphlet called "AIDS, Sex and You," is misleading because it implies a person should only practice safe sex if he or she believes a sexual partner may have the AIDS virus.

The pamphlet states, "...if you do have sex with a person you think may be infected, protect yourself by taking precautions to prevent contact with that person's body fluids."

Schuman said anyone who is sexually active should practice safe sex because it is impossible to determine if a potential partner has been infected if he or she does not have an AIDS-related illness.

The AIDS virus can live in the bloodstream for years without affecting the body but the infected individual is still contagious, Schuman said.

The psychological effects of a positive response for the AIDS virus antibody can be overwhelming because the fear of getting AIDS will be with the person forever, Schuman said.

"Are you going to walk around in terror the rest of your life?" he asked.

If a person decides to be tested, he or she should go to the public health department and use an anonymous last name, he said. Record of a positive AIDS antibody test can result in denial of medical and life insurance and employment in Kansas, Schuman said.

Cure for AIDS not imminent, experts say

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

The recent blitz of information on AIDS is leading many people to believe a cure or at least a preventive vaccine will soon be found. In actuality, that may never happen, said Charles Wood, assistant professor of microbiology at the University of Kansas, who is researching the virus.

An AIDS vaccine will be difficult to develop because the virus is constantly changing. Even though a vaccine might kill one strain of the virus, it may not affect another strain, he said.

The human immunodeficiency virus that causes AIDS can be compared with cold viruses, Wood said.

Like a cold, there are "hundreds of (AIDS) viruses you can get," he said. A person may recover from a cold caused by one virus and still contract another, he said.

On March 18, the New York Times reported that a preventive vaccine may be available for testing by this summer.

However, it stated, "a proven vaccine does not appear likely for five or 10 years, perhaps not before the next century, in the view of leading experts."

A French scientist, Daniel Zagury, injected himself with a test vaccine that stimulated the production of antibodies to the virus.

Wood said even though Zagury produced antibodies, his test is a small representation upon which to base facts.

Before an effective vaccine is discovered, "we have to understand more about the disease," he said.

Wood is working to develop a more accurate test for the HIV antibody. ELISA, the primary test currently used to detect the HIV antibody, often produces a false positive result, Wood said. Samples that show a positive result in the ELISA test are then screened through Western blot — a more sophisticated and almost 100 percent accurate test.

Presence of HIV antibody in the system shows that the virus is living in the body and that the system has produced antibodies to ward it off. Related ailments occur when antibodies can no longer adequately fight off the virus.

Blood is not used by the Red Cross if it gives a positive response to ELISA, even if this test proves false, Wood said.

Elsie Lehr, administrator of the blood program in the Red Cross regional headquarters in Wichita, said 6 percent of blood is disposed of because it gives a positive response to tests for HIV or hepatitis.

Sophie Smith, Red Cross lab director of technical services in Wichita, said about 90 percent of the blood that tests positive to ELISA is actually not infected and gives a negative response to Western blot. But the number of actual pints of blood lost is relatively low, she said. Only about 10 pints out of every 8,000 units tested are destroyed due to HIV, she said.

A false positive result occurs in ELISA because the virus is taken from cultivated cells, cells removed from the body and grown in test tubes. Antibodies that may form against the parent cell would give a false positive reading in the test for antibodies against the virus, Wood said.

While some of the virus genes are constantly changing, there may be regions that remain constant from strain to strain in all infected people, Wood said. Therefore, he is attempting to identify conserved portions (portions that remain the same) of viral genes for use in an antibody test.

The genes would be placed in bacteria to facilitate the formation of viral protein to be used in testing the antibody. This test would be advantageous for two reasons, he said. Viral protein can be produced in large quantities in bacteria, and the test would be more accurate because it would isolate pure viral proteins, he said.

Wood said his test, which he estimates will be "over 90 percent accurate," could replace ELISA and perhaps eliminate the need for Western blot, a much more complicated test that "cannot be done easily in a clinical lab."

Wood said by isolating a conserved portion, he may eventually be able to develop a vaccine to induce protective antibodies. However, he said similar tests have not yet produced antibodies adequately.

Wood said his test should be ready for clinical use within a year.

Reagan suggests 'no' as solution to AIDS

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — President Reagan, in his first major speech on the health crisis, said Wednesday that local schools and parents must decide how to educate children on the threat of AIDS but also must stress morality and avoid a "value neutral" approach.

He told reporters, however, he doesn't quarrel with calls for use of preventive measures such as condoms against the sexual transmission of the disease.

"All the vaccines and medications in the world won't change one basic truth — that prevention is better than cure," Reagan told the Philadelphia College of Physicians, one of the nation's oldest professional medical associations.

"We've declared AIDS public health enemy No. 1," the president said. And he pledged, "I'm determined we'll find a cure for AIDS...we'll find a way or make one."

Reagan said the federal role amounted to giving "educators accurate information about the disease."

But, supporting statements by Education Secretary William Bennett, he also said the dissemination of such information "must be up to the schools and the parents, not government."

Until now, the administration's principal spokesman on the issue has been Surgeon General C. Everett Koop. He has taken a more aggressive stance than Bennett, saying that beyond abstinence, the surest protection is the use of condoms and the education of children as early as the third grade.

But Reagan also told reporters that "I don't quarrel with" Koop's advice on prevention.

Asked earlier if people should "just say no," he replied, "That's a pretty good answer. Yes." First lady Nancy Reagan has used the slogan "Just Say No" to help youngsters battle drug abuse.

As of March 23, actual AIDS had been diagnosed in 33,158 Americans, of whom some 19,000 have died since 1979.

While the president has spoken on the AIDS issue before — requesting Koop last Feb. 5 to undertake a study of the problem — he has been largely silent on the issue of giving advice to Americans on preventive and protective measures.

In his speech, Reagan noted that the Public Health Service has issued an information and education plan to help control the spread of the disease.

Reagan spoke one day endorsing AIDS education in schools as long as it includes the teaching of sexual abstinence.

He made the comments to reporters at a state dinner Tuesday night in honor of the French Prime Minister Jacques Chirac, hours after the two nations agreed to settle a U.S.-French dispute over a patent for AIDS screening tests.

Support groups provide class training

By KIM GREER
Collegian Reporter

Six graduate students in counseling are learning how to help their fellow students deal with sensitive personal issues.

In Advanced Counseling, a class taught by Fred Newton, associate professor of education and director of the Counseling Center in Holton Hall, students work in teams of two, as leaders for month-long support groups dealing with relationship improvement, alcohol and the family, and herpes.

Student interest played an important role in determining the subjects for the support groups, Newton said. Subjects were chosen on the basis of many requests students made through both the Counseling Center and Lafene Student Health Center, Newton said.

The groups began meeting the week of March 23. Because the sessions will only meet once a week for four weeks, Newton said they are not really considered to be therapy.

"Four weeks is not really therapy," Newton said. "These are more (like) support groups."

The ideal group size is five to 12 people. Newton said this helps "facilitate interaction."

Newton said the purpose of the group sessions is to provide training for the counseling students, as well as to provide a needed service to the campus community.

The students in Newton's class are not novices. Newton said the class members have had other counseling classes as prerequisites, and many of the students have already had some actual counseling experience.

"Many of (the graduate students) are already experienced professionals," Newton said. "They have had some kind of experience and decided to get a (counseling) degree."

Because his students are currently working toward a counseling degree, Newton called them professionals at dealing with the need for impromptu counseling that can arise in any career situation.

To prepare for counseling sessions, the group leaders formed a group among themselves and practiced leading discussions, Newton said. Newton supervised and offered suggestions to help the students with their support groups.

Art Rathbun, graduate student in counseling, is one leader for the herpes support group. As a minister in Salina, Rathbun had much previous experience in offering problem-solving guidance — a basic function of counseling.

As group leaders, the students learn to deal with the dynamics of helping several people at one time, Newton said. The experience contrasts to working in a one-to-one counseling situation.

The relationship enhancement group is for people seeking guidance or support in boyfriend/girlfriend or roommate relationships.

Rich Beans, graduate student in counseling, said he and his partner Joni Hays, graduate student in counseling, wanted to stay away from the more "complicated dynamics" present in the relationships of married couples.

Newton said members of groups dealing with some issue of alcoholism usually establish a rapport quickly. He said this is because many of the participants have had previous experience with groups such as Alcoholics Anonymous.

Mike Arpin, graduate student in counseling, and Emilie Fredericks, graduate student in counseling, lead the group for adult children from alcoholic families. Arpin said many of the group members had experience in group situations. He also said the fact that the group leaders are students did not seem to cause any consternation.

Other group leaders said the same was true of their groups. Hays and Bean said they thought the group members were put at ease because group leaders introduced themselves and listed their previous counseling activities.

Because of the sensitive nature of the subject of each group, leaders have had to learn how to handle the issue of confidentiality within their groups.

Rathbun and Cindy Stephen, graduate student in counseling, lead the herpes support group. This group is for people who have either contracted herpes or had some kind of contact with another person with the disease.

"Most people (who contract herpes) shun away from a support group at a time when they need it most, at the initial time of discovery (of their infection)," Stephen said.

Wildcats capture double-header from SMSU

Staff/Andy Nelson

Mike Hinkle (6) slides into Southwest Missouri State second baseman John Wahlig (8) to break up a double play in the first inning of the first game of a double-header Wednesday at Frank Myers Field. K-State scored two runs in the inning and swept the twin bill.

By BILL LANG
Collegian Reporter

When former Chicago Cubs' great Ernie Banks said, "It's a great day to play two," he wasn't referring to the day K-State's and Southwest Missouri State's baseball teams played.

With wind blowing in from right-center field at about 25 mph and a temperature of about 40 degrees, the Wildcats braved the chill and swept a double-header from the Bears, 7-4 and 2-0, Wednesday at Frank Myers Field.

With the sweep the 'Cats now stand at 12-10 on the year. Southwest Missouri State dropped to 22-7.

"With wind and the temperature the way it was it made it really tough to play," K-State Coach Mike Clark said. "The team really concentrated and got a good couple of wins."

Clark said the pitching was the key to the wins, adding that Jeff Peterson and Mike Hinkle both threw excellent games.

In the first game, K-State took a 2-0 lead in the first inning. Russ Ringgenberg was safe on an error then advanced to second on a passed ball by Bears' catcher Dan Hickman.

A balk by pitcher Jim Gibbs sent Ringgenberg to third, then Southwest Missouri's pitcher threw a wild pitch bringing Ringgenberg home for the first score of the game.

Tony Braddock then drew a walk to continue the inning. Mike Hinkle then hit an infield moving Braddock around to third base. Catcher Jeff Turtle followed and was safe at first after Hinkle broke up a double-play opportunity and Braddock scored the second run of the inning.

In the top of the third inning, Southwest Missouri erupted for four runs to take a 4-2 advantage — three of them coming off Howard Patton's second home run of the season.

But in the bottom of the fourth, K-State staged a comeback and scored three runs on three hits moving them back on top of the Bears 5-4.

The 'Cats scored once more in the fifth, and once more in the sixth when Mike Hinkle hit a homer over the right-field fence. Pitcher Jeff Peterson, 3-2, shutout the Bears the rest of the game to get the win.

Hinkle, 2-0, threw a two-hit shutout and only allowed one hit in the first and third innings.

But it was a good thing that Hinkle was hot as Southwest Missouri limited the 'Cats to just two runs on four hits. Otto Kaifes, with his first game-winner of the season, and Tony Braddock collected the RBI for K-State.

The next action for the Wildcats will be Saturday as they travel to Oklahoma for a double-header with the Sooners.

Mets' scout looks at K-State

By BILL LANG
Collegian Reporter

While everybody at the K-State-Southwest Missouri State baseball game Wednesday was talking about the cold, Cookie Mitchell was enjoying the action.

Mitchell, from Kansas City, Kan., works as a part-time talent scout for the 1986 world champion New York Mets.

Although talent scouts are rarely heard about, their role in the organization may be the most important. Scouts strengthen the team with talent they say will help the team the most.

For Mitchell, though, the biggest thrill of his job is to discover that one player with the chance to be a major leaguer, to find, in Mitchell's words, "that diamond in the rough."

"A lot of talent gets passed over nowadays," Mitchell said. "When you find that one, though, that has the skills that are required, it's really gratifying."

Before this season, Mitchell coached along with his scouting duties.

"It was kind of hectic trying to coach some kids and also look at some kids," he said. "Now that I'm retired from coaching I have a lot more time to look at the kids and enjoy the game."

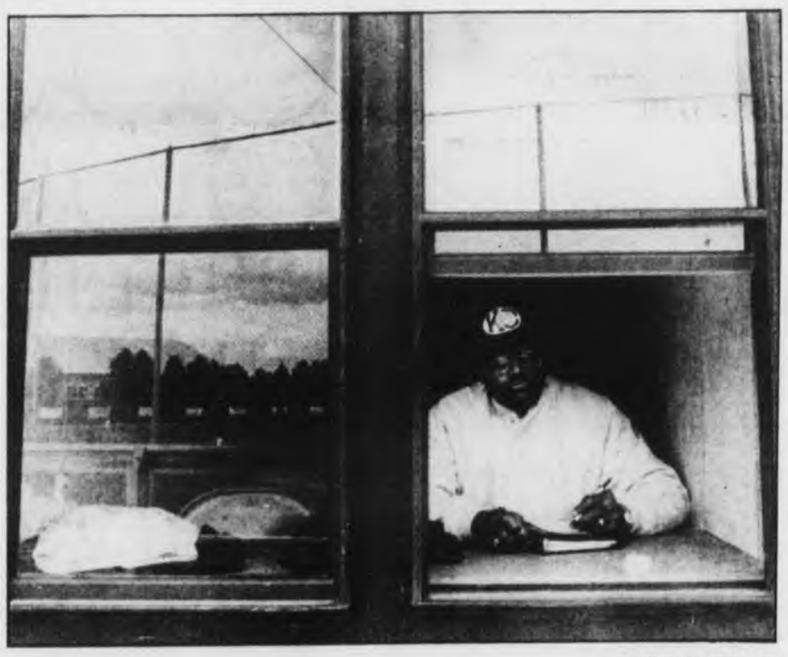
During his 18-year coaching tenure, he instructed several former K-Staters, among them Rob Holder ('79-'80), Duane Harms ('80-'82) and Scott McClahahan ('82-'83). Mitchell also coached former K-State football player Jeff Hurd, who played for Mitchell while in high school.

Two players Mitchell said he felt most proud of coaching were former Wichita State standout Russ Morman, now with the Chicago White Sox, and the Philadelphia Phillies' Steve Jeltz.

Mitchell's stint with the Mets starts in mid-March and runs through mid-October.

"It's a long time on the road," he said. "But it's baseball and baseball is fun to watch."

And baseball has been his life.



"I started in the summer of '68 with a 14-and-under league," Mitchell said. "From there it was on to the 21-and-under league...there to coaching...to scouting."

Mitchell said there isn't any one player in the area he covers who sticks out in his mind.

"All the players that I have seen are almost equal in talent."

While at the game a few members of the media tried to pry an answer from Mitchell's mouth as to who he was looking at.

"Both teams," Mitchell said with a grin. "Both teams are good and it's hard to say. I'm just enjoying the game."

KC falls 6-1 to Montreal

By The Associated Press

WEST PALM BEACH, Fla. — Mitch Webster had three hits, scored two runs and stole three bases and Jeff Reed hit a two-run homer as Montreal defeated Kansas City 6-1 Wednesday.

Jay Tibbs pitched seven strong innings for Montreal, allowing six hits while striking out four and walking none. Kansas City starter Danny Jackson gave up 12 hits.

Bo Jackson doubled home Danny Tartabull for the Royals only run in the fourth, but Montreal came right back in their half of the inning to score two on Reed's homer.

Men's team to open golf season; women's squad looks to tourney

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

It's turning into a hectic week for K-State men's and women's golf coach Rob Sedorcek.

After returning from a two-day women's tournament in Springfield, Mo., he's been busy preparing the men's team for the KSU Invitational this Thursday and Friday. He's also making sure the women's team is getting ready Monday for the Susie Maxwell Tournament in Norman, Okla.

The weather hasn't made his job any easier. Neither team has been able to practice much since coming back from spring break.

"Last week (the weather) kind of hurt us real bad," Sedorcek said. "We had things going pretty good up until spring break and then when we came back we weren't really able to touch a club for four or five days."

"Nobody played as well as they had before break because they hadn't touched a club for five days," he added.

First up for Sedorcek is the men's season opener, the KSU Invitational. They will be competing against Creighton, Emporia State and Marymount at the Manhattan Country Club.

The Wildcats "didn't qualify real well but it was kind of bad weather," Sedorcek said. "If we would have qualified two-three weeks ago when the weather was in the 60s and 70s it would have been great.

"They were shooting right around 290 then, but now they shot a couple of 300s, 301s this past week when they qualified, so it wasn't as good as I hoped," he added. "Hopefully, they're saving them for this weekend."

Both teams, he said, showed a lot of improvement during the fall season and he feels confident they can improve from last-place finishes in the Big Eight Conference last spring.

The women's team started the spring season with a 10th-place showing in the North Texas State University Invitational.

Earlier this week the team took top honors at the Southwest Missouri State University Invitational. Paige Harrison placed second individually and Jill Zientara took third-place honors to lead the Wildcats to the victory.

Sedorcek is looking for the momentum and confidence from Tuesday's victory to carry over into the meet Monday in Norman.

"They are going to have some of that needed confidence they were lacking going into this season," he said. "The (three) seniors have all played these courses and they know a lot what it's like, but they haven't had too much confidence — they have one good round and then they have one bad round."

"I think the victory down at Southwest Missouri State will help out their confidence for them, knowing they can play and shoot the scores they are capable of shooting," he added.

Twelve teams are expected to compete in the meet, he said.

"Most of them are Texas schools, Lamar, Texas Tech, TCU, SMU," he said. "Oklahoma, KU, Missouri, Nebraska, Iowa State and us will be there. It should be a good field."

Gooden to enter rehab program for drug users

By The Associated Press

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. — Dwight Gooden, the talented but troubled New York Mets pitcher, agreed Wednesday to undergo treatment for a "drug use problem" rather than be suspended by Commissioner Peter Ueberroth.

The 1985 National League Cy Young award winner probably would have started on Tuesday when the World Series champions opened the season against Pittsburgh.

Mets General Manager Frank Cashen said Gooden voluntarily took a drug test earlier this week and it gave "some indication of past usage, but the extent is uncertain."

Edwin Durso, baseball's secretary-treasurer and executive vice president, said Cashen called Ueberroth on Monday and told him "there was a clear indication of a drug problem."

"The commissioner made it perfectly clear to the Mets that, consistent with past policy, he was prepared to take severe disciplinary action against Dwight Gooden if the player did not seek an appropriate remedy," Durso said.

Ueberroth, in a statement from Chandler, Ariz., said: "Our policy is simple. If a player is willing to help himself, he gets one chance. If he is unwilling to cooperate or a problem occurs a second time, then we will take the penalty route."

Ueberroth conditionally suspended 11 players, among them Keith Hernandez of the Mets, in March 1986 following testimony during drug trials in Pittsburgh. All 11 were allowed to keep playing if they donated part of their salary to drug programs, performed community service and agreed to undergo drug testing.

Gooden agreed to treament following a 1½-hour meeting Wednesday morning with Cashen and Joe McIlvaine, the club vice president of baseball operations.

Rumors involving Gooden, 22, and drugs surfaced last summer after the pitcher's often brilliant outings became inconsistent. His record dropped from 24-4 in his Cy Young season to 17-6 while his earned run average rose from 1.53 to 2.84.

Gooden also struggled through a series of off-the-field incidents. He missed the Mets' ticker tape parade after winning the World Series and then got into a fight with Tampa police in December.

The Mets placed Gooden on the 15-day disabled list, and team spokesman Jay Horwitz said, "We don"t know when he'll be back."

Jim Neader, Gooden's agent, said Gooden would "go in for an evaluation soon, probably by the end of the week," most likely in New York.

Neader said Gooden "doesn't think there is a major problem, but there is a question in his mind. He wants to get it answered. Dwight is feeling positive, he wants to get this taken care of."

Gooden's father, Dan, said he had "no idea" his son had a drug problem.

"He said he'd never messed with the stuff," Dan Gooden told the Tampa Tribune. "I don't know what to say. It's kind of stunning."

Cashen told other Mets about Gooden's problem Wednesday morning before the team left for an exhibition game against Pittsburgh in Bradenton.

"The first reaction in the locker room naturally was shock," Horwitz said.

Gooden was the National League Rookie of the Year in 1984 when he jumped from Class A Lynchburg to the majors at age 19. He was 17-9 that year with a 2.60 ERA and set a record for rookies with 276 strikeouts.

Salvadoran invasion leaves American soldier fatally shot

By The Associated Press

SAN SALVADOR, El Salvador — Guerrillas enlisted in the army and infiltrated the El Paraiso infantry base before the big attack that killed 69 Salvadoran soldiers and a U.S. military adviser, the base commander said Wednesday.

The Green Beret U.S. Army sergeant killed was the first American serviceman to die in battle in El Salvador's 7-year-old civil war.

"There had to be someone who infiltrated," Col. Gilberto Rubio, commander of the base, told reporters.

He said the army had concrete leads and was investigating the infiltration of the 4th Infantry Brigade garrison, which was attacked before dawn Tuesday by guerrillas using mortars, rocket-propelled grenades and automatic weapons.

"I won't say the number or names" of the infiltrators, Rubio said.

Another officer at the base on Tuesday identified one of the dead guerrillas as an infiltrator.

"He's a recruit. We don't have his name, but he entered (the army) a short time ago and was wearing shorts from the Panther Battalion," the officer said. The officer refused to be further identified.

Helicopter-borne troops and infantry soldiers combed the northern mountains Wednesday for the attackers from the Farabundo Marti National Liberation Front, an umbrella for five guerrilla organizations fighting the U.S.-backed government.

Soldiers in camouflage fatigues cleaned up the charred debris around the barracks at the base 37 miles north of San Salvador in Chalatenango province. Several buildings had gaping holes in their walls from mortars, grenades and explosives.

Nine rebels were killed in the assault, the armed forces said.

The body of Staff Sgt. Gregory A. Fronius, 27, of Scottdale, Pa., was flown Tuesday night to his base in Panama. He had arrived in El Salvador on Jan. 6 for a six-month tour, the U.S. Embassy said.

In Panama, U.S. Embassy spokesman Bill Ormsbee said funeral services for Fronius, who was married and the father of two children, would be conducted Friday in Pennsylvania.

Fronius was the only American at the garrison at the time of the attack, the U.S. Embassy said. The other military adviser assigned to the base was in the capital.

The U.S. Congress has limited the number of American military advisers in El Salvador to 55. They are prohibited from going into combat situations. However, they carry small arms and are allowed to defend themselves if attacked.

ingham and Urban believe salmonella infection can be prevented.

"Anyone who properly cooks food and practices common sense and personal hygiene does not have to worry about salmonella infection," Cunningham said.

"For example, if someone is cutting up chicken on a cutting board, the salmonella from the chicken can get on the cutting board," he said. "If he cuts up lettuce on the same board without washing the board, he may pass salmonella from one food to another."

Although the salmonella bacteria can be killed by heat, refrigeration of infected foods allows the bacteria to live.

"The salmonella bacteria will live at refrigerated temperatures, but it will not multiply," Urban said. "However, bacteria have the potential to multiply.

"For example, if a food had 100 bacteria on it, it might not make you sick, but the 100 multiplies to become 200 and the 200 become 300, until the bacteria reaches a toxic level," Urban said. "They may not stop growing when their level reaches toxic."

Urban said a portion of contaminated food containing bacteria that have grown is more toxic than the same portion of food containing bacteria that have not grown.

Eating contaminated food could cause a person to become sick. Cunningham said those most susceptible to salmonella infection are infants or someone who is "very" ill.

"A good dose (of the salmonella bacteria) could be fatal, but less than 1 percent of all clinical cases of salmonella result in fatalities," Cunningham said. "Normal, healthy individuals don't have anything to fear."

In a study by the U.S. Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta, researchers concluded that the use of anitbiotics to keep farm animals healthy could also make people sick by spreading drug-resistant germs from the barnyard to the dinner table.

In the research, doctors traced germ-laden hamburger from people who got food poisoning through the food chain to worn-out dairy cows that were slaughtered for meat.

The hamburger was tainted with a particular form of salmonella bacteria blamed for 675 cases of food poisoning, including two deaths, in California in 1985.

"If it existed, it had to be transmitted by cross contamination by handling raw and then cooked meat," Cunningham said.

Urban said any food eaten will have some bacteria, but the human body has learned to deal with the bacteria.

"Historically, whenever we have been confronted with salmonella contamination, the effects on humans have been serious," he said. "For that reason you must handle foodstuffs with salmonella differently than food that is not contaminated."

Bills

financial aid, the tuition tie-in and improving the whole of university funding could be examined.

Although Tallman said he does not expect the bill to come up again this session, the issue is not going to go away.

"People think the tuition policy we have now is inappropriate," he said.

Action on the admission standards proposal was essentially the same.

The bill, introduced by the House Appropriations Committee, would allow the Kansas Board of Regents to set admissions standards at state institutions and allow for different policies among the Regents institutions.

This proposal was also recommended for study by the educational planning committee.

The two bills receiving approval were residency and a state work study proposals.

House Bill 2020 allows individuals and their family members who are recruited to Kansas by private businesses to pay in-state tuition fees at Kansas state universities the first year. The bill also mandates the Regents to write the regulations for the policy.

Another provision of the bill allows students graduating from Kansas high schools who are planning to attend an accredited institution of higher education in the state and whose parents are moving before they graduate from high school to be considered in-state residents regardless of their families' new addresses.

Another bill sets in statute a program state universities have been implementing since 1983. The Kansas Career Work Study Program bill received House approval Wednesday, directing the program's guidance and promotion to the Regents.

The bill provides state money for students to work in private industry in a position allied with their major field of study.

Tallman said while the state work study program has been in effect at state universities for three years, it has met with varying degrees of success. He said K-State has been among the most successful institutions implementing the program.

said Sen. Jim Allen, R-Ottawa.

But Kerr said, "They already have many issues to deal with. We should go beyond that in membership and have some of the higher-education entities involved."

"Otherwise it won't have enough clout to come back and get it all through," he said.

Kerr suggested establishing a steering committee to oversee the work of a consultant, who would make actual recommendations.

The House-passed bill would transfer supervision of the state's 19 community colleges and Washburn from the State Board of Education to the Regents.

The Regents would have two committees, one to handle issues concerning community colleges and Washburn and the other for the six Regents universities and Kansas Technical Institute in Salina.

The original House bill also would have moved vocational schools from the jurisdiction of the Board of Education to the Regents. But the House Education Committee amended the bill to keep vocational schools under the Board of Education.

But Harder said he also wants to study where vocational schools should be placed in the state's education system.

"I'm not happy with what we've done with vocational education," Harder said. "I don't know where it should go yet."

Harder said the committee would continue its discussion of how to set up a study on the issue after finding out what procedures other states had used to change their state education governance systems.

ty is credited with creating children within the mother's womb and also with fashioning the first humans, male and female, in a similar form.

A set consists of three drums of different sizes played by three drummers. The largest drum is called iya igbin, the second, jagba, and the smallest, epele.

The two smaller drums are played with unfashioned sticks, while the larger may be played with a single stick and the palm, fist or fingers of the left hand. By varying the fingering and the use of the left hand, a variety of effects may be achieved.

The group has performed at various functions and will be featured April 10 at the African Student Union's African night at Pottorf Hall in CiCo Park.

Highway financing scores legislative victory

Senate ignores presidential request, overrides veto

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate rejected a personal, last-minute plea from President Reagan and voted Thursday to override his veto and enact into law an $88 billion highway and mass transit bill.

The 67-33 vote, exactly the two-thirds majority necessary, capped two days of political struggle over the bill that became a high-stakes test of wills between the Republican president and leaders of the Senate's Democratic majority.

Democrats reclaimed one vote they had lost in an initial test on Wednesday, but Republicans were unable to switch any of the 13 GOP senators who voted to override the president's veto the day before.

Besides authorizing highway and mass transit projects that the president had opposed as overladen with pork, the bill permits states to boost the speed limit on rural stretches of interstate highways to 65 mph from the current 55 mph.

But arguments over the substance of the legislation were overtaken by the political fight.

Afterwards, though, the winners and losers alike sought to minimize the impact on the president's influence.

"This isn't going to make or break the president of the United States," said Senate Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W.Va. "There will be other vetoes."

Reagan issued a statement saying he was "deeply disappointed" by the outcome but vowing to continue the battle against excessive federal spending.

White House spokesman Marlin Fitzwater said the defeat would help the president by demonstrating his willingness to fight in his final 21 months in office.

Hours before the vote, Reagan had upped the ante in terms of his political prestige by visiting the Capitol to plead with GOP senators to back him.

Fitzwater quoted Reagan as telling the senators, "I beg you for your vote. Give us this vote and let us stand for a majority (within the Republican Party) that can run this party."

But after the extraordinary meeting, Republican Leader Bob Dole of Kansas told the Senate, "I think it's safe to say no minds were changed."

Reagan, after deciding on short notice to travel from the White House to the Capitol, spent two hours trying to press his case. First he met with all Republican senators, then with the 13 who sided with Democrats in the first vote on Wednesday.

"The president is heightening the stakes by coming up here," Byrd said. "But I don't blame him, giving it the old college try."

At issue was a measure that permits states to raise the speed limit to 65 mph on rural stretches of interstate highways and earmarks more than 100 highway demonstration projects tailor-made for individual lawmakers.

Reagan vetoed the bill last week, calling it a budget-buster that is larded with wasteful projects.

Democrats maintained that the bill is under budget, and said that sustaining the veto would cause the loss of 800,000 jobs during the warm weather construction season.

But beyond the legislation itself, the veto fight became a test of Reagan's standing and prestige after months of political damage caused by the Iran-Contra affair.

The Senate voted 65-35, with one vote to spare, to sustain the president's action on Wednesday, but a change of heart by Democrat Terry Sanford of North Carolina, a 69-year-old freshman senator, left Democratic leaders confident of overriding the veto on the second, reconsideration vote Thursday.

The House voted 350-73 on Tuesday to override the veto, but it takes a two-thirds vote of both houses to enact the bill into law over a veto.

Sen. Alfonse M. D'Amato of New York, one of the 13 Republicans voting against the president, said this legislation was the "wrong area to test political wills."

Another, Sen. Pete Wilson from Reagan's home state of California, said that during the meeting with the president, "I said it was a painful thing for me to have to disagree with an old friend...But in good conscience I had to vote in disagreement."

State projects to gain $142 million

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate overrode on Thursday President Reagan's veto of highway finance legislation, freeing $142 million for Kansas and providing money to start two special road projects.

Kansas Sens. Bob Dole and Nancy Kassebaum, both Republicans, were on the losing side of the 67-33 vote, the second on the veto in two days. They supported Reagan.

On Wednesday, the Senate voted 65-35 to sustain the veto. However, Democrats used a parliamentary maneuver to force another roll call and then persuaded Sen. Terry Sanford, D-N.C., to switch his vote and support the override.

Dole and Kassebaum voted both times to sustain the veto. They contended the votes were crucial for determining the strength of the Reagan presidency in the wake of the Iran-Contra affair.

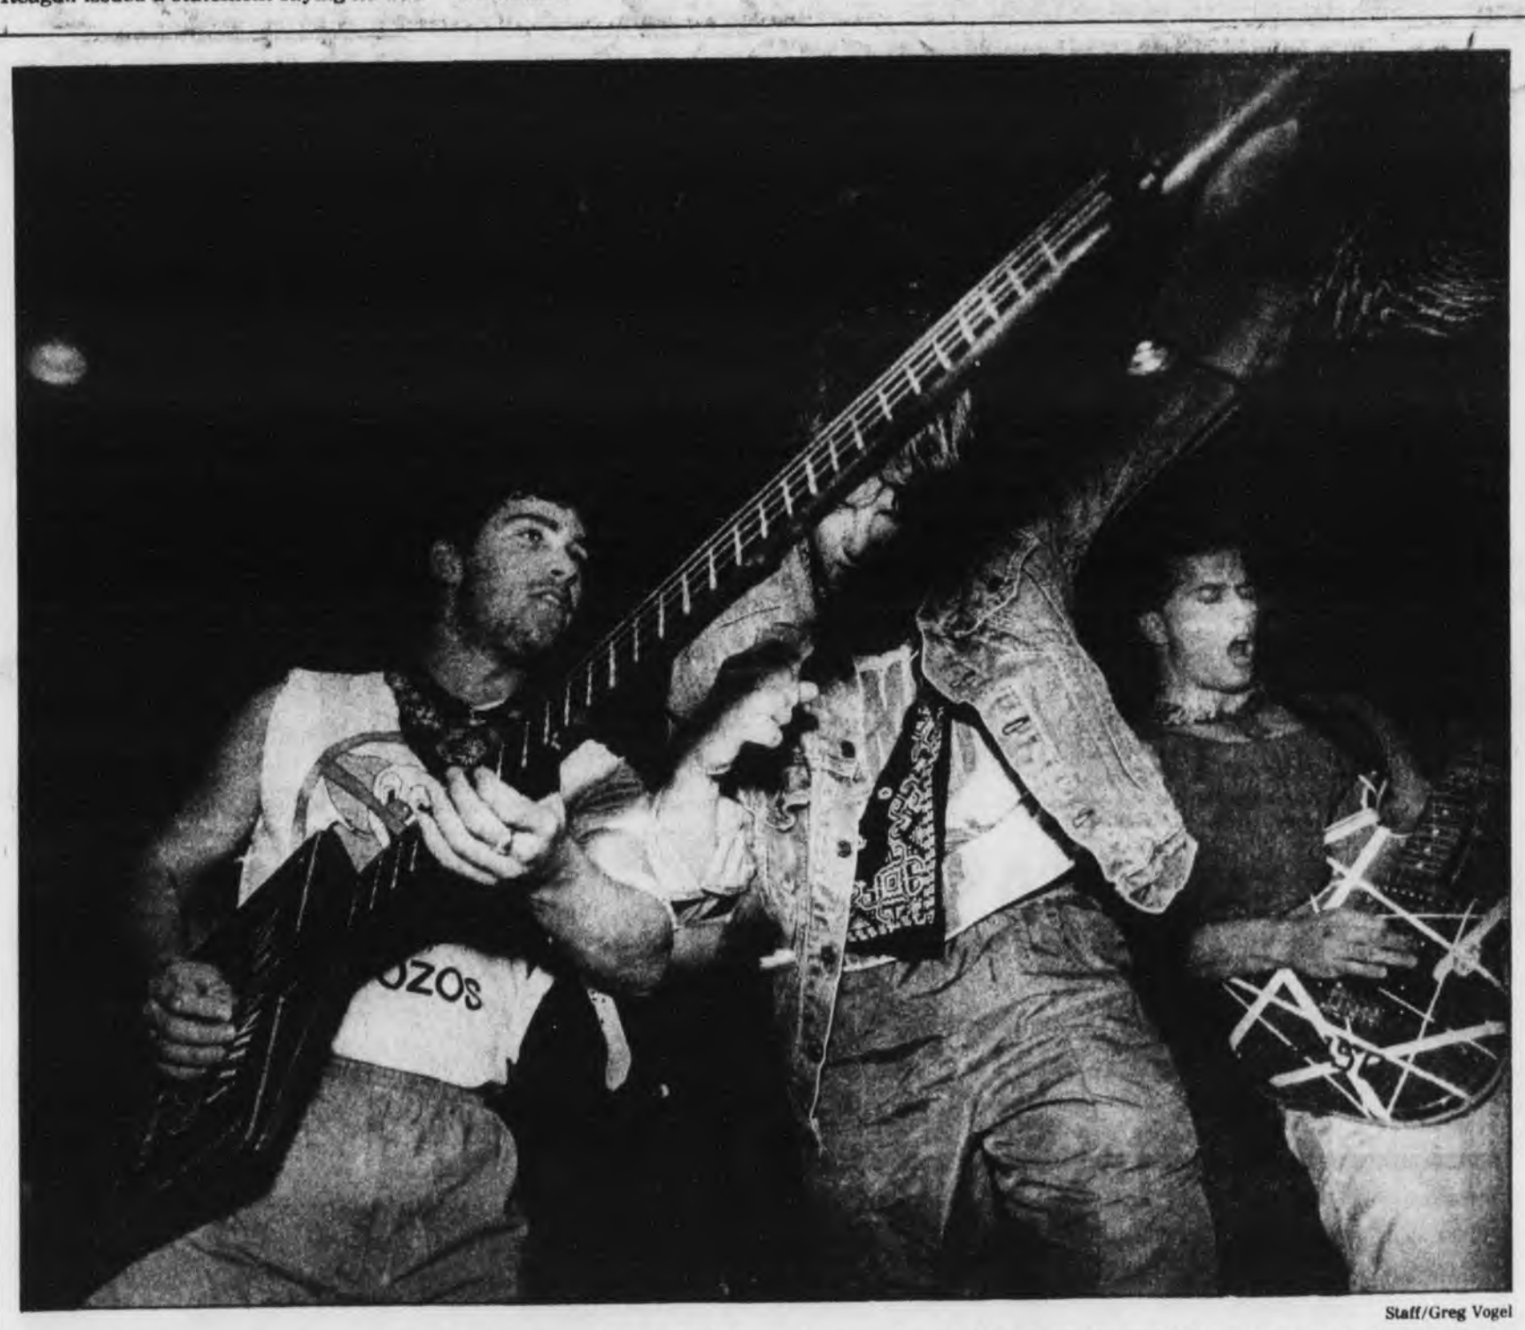
"In the final analysis, I think we've had our shot at it," Dole said before the final override vote. "Our batting average is not nearly as good as the majority leader's but we'll keep on trying."

Kassebaum has said she considered it bad legislative policy for Congress to set road-building priorities in states by financing work on so-called demonstration projects. The bill contained $890 million for more than 100 of the special projects, which Reagan criticized as pork barrel politics.

The Senate action follows a 350-73 override vote on Tuesday in the House and finishes work on the highway bill.

The five-year, $88 billion measure finances the nation's highway and mass transit system by distributing money to the states from the federal motor fuel tax.

Kansas will receive $142 million this year under the new law compared to $166.88 million in 1986, according to the Federal Highway Administration. Only three states will receive more money because of changes in financing formulas.



Here are the two Kansas demonstration projects:

— Construction of an access road west of Lawrence between Interstate 70 and Clinton Lake. The measure provides $7.2 million in federal money for the project over five years. The work is part of a $38 million project for a bypass linking I-70 and Kansas 10 east of Lawrence.

— A new interchange at 119th Street and I-35 in Olathe. The measure provides $20.8 million over five years for the project, which is estimated to cost $26 million.

In addition, the measure gives broader powers to the state to finance two other projects — a new overpass on Prairie Street in Emporia and a new interchange at Kellogg and Oliver in Wichita.

Although the new law provides no federal money for the projects, it permits the state to pay for them with any federal highway money they receive. Normally, road aid is restricted for specific purposes.

'Singers' strut in SAMS competition

By JUDD ANNIS
Collegian Reporter

Local talent was decked out for a rockin' good time Thursday evening at the second annual Students Against Multiple Sclerosis Rock Alike lip sync competition.

"Rock Alike is always a rockin' good time," said Mark Mathewson, bartender at Brother's Tavern in Aggieville. "I never knew there was so much local talent in Manhattan."

Rock Alike, which featured four bands this year, provided the setting for area K-Staters to strut their stuff, including real instruments and costumes, to the recording of their favorite artist in front of about 250 people. The bands were in competition for various prizes and the distinction of K-State's best lip sync band.

The winning band for this year's contest was Sigma Chi, who performed to the Van Halen tune "Best of Both Worlds." Taking top spot for the most money raised and the most enthusiastic crowd response, the Sigma Chi's prize was a night at Manhattan's Holiday Inn and Holidome.

LaDenna Russell-Bessert, chairman of SAMS and senior in biology, said Rock Alike is one of the organization's biggest fund-raisers even though SAMS and Rock Alike are only in their second year. SAMS a national organizaton involving approximately 250 colleges, was formed by the National Society for Multiple Sclerosis.

"In last year's contest interest was so high because SAMS was a new group," Russell-Bessert said, enthusiastic but tired after a day of preparation for the evening.

Because Rock Alike raises money for SAMS and that money in turn goes to help fight multiple sclerosis, each band was required to pay an entry fee of $150.

Although Russell-Bessert was not sure how much this year's Rock Alike contest would raise, she did say it would be of significant help in SAMS' fight against multiple sclerosis.

Senators drop bill rejecting compact

By Staff and Wire Reports

In a tense hearing Thursday, about 100 subdued Kansans watched as the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee rejected the proposal to remove Kansas from the Central Interstate Waste Compact.

Committee members decided to pursue the establishment of a Kansas low-level radioactive waste disposal authority by approving its passage to an interim committee for further study. It may come up during the summer session.

At one point, during the hearing, senators made an attempt to link two bills calling for Kansas' withdrawal from the compact and banning burial of radioactive waste within state borders. The attempt failed 7-4. It is not certain whether the bills will be revived or not.

Several committee members loudly opposed the way decision-making about the compact had been handled.

"We haven't taken an active enough role in the compact," said Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, who opposed the amendment. "We haven't kept ourselves as informed as we should have been and we haven't kept the citizens as informed as they should have been."

Sen. Francis Gordon, R-Highland, said pulling out of the compact would be premature because a host state for the dump site has not been chosen.

Sen. Paul Feleciano, D-Wichita, the committee's most vocal critic of the compact, said Kansas probably would become the host state for a regional waste site it would have little control over if it stayed in the compact.

"My intent is to continue this fight," Feleciano said after the meeting. "I think we're making a mistake."

The state's participation in the compact with Arkansas, Louisiana, Nebraska and Oklahoma has been a hot issue this session because of Congress' 1988 deadline for compacts to choose host states for regional dump sites. The sites must be operating by 1993.

The scenario is the same for hundreds of K-State students each week.

Some people out for the evening in Aggieville inevitably wind up at the doorstep of Falsetto's Pizza, 1127 Moro St., a nearly all-night pizza parlor that serves by the slice.

Many customers of Falsetto's are familiar with the man who caters to late-night foot traffic in Aggieville. He can often be found visiting with customers in his shop until the early hours of the morning on any given day of the week. Even so, many people don't know just how this man wound up in Manhattan. His story is of family, determination, struggle and, ultimately, fate.

His name is John Falsetto, and you can bet that he's every bit as Italian as his Neapolitan-style pizza.

Falsetto was born and raised in Seattle, Wash., the grandson of Italian immigrants. His family heritage stems back to Sicily, Italy, from where his grandfather hails, and Poilo, Italy, his grandmother's birthplace.

Upon arriving in America, the elder Falsetto settled in Seattle, where he married, raised his family and worked as a tailor for 50 years.

John attributes all of his expertise in the cuisine to his mother, who learned to cook Italian food from her mother.

"My dad worked construction, and he got laid off every year for about three months," Falsetto said. "So my mom, to supplement our income, made manicotti (a form of pasta) at our home. We were so young we would call them pancakes. We'd say 'Mom, do we have to make pancakes again?' We sold to three restaurants in Seattle, and that's how we got by."

It was from one of these Italian restaurants that Falsetto received his first job.

"One of the owners of the Italian restaurants we serviced hired me when I was 15. I made salads, garlic breads, spaghetti and stuff like that. That was my real first start into the business."

American defects to Soviet Union

MOSCOW — The Kremlin announced Thursday an American soldier and his West German wife had defected to the Soviet Union and been granted asylum because they feared political persecution.

The U.S. Army in West Germany and the Pentagon in Washington could not confirm the defection, which would be the first by an American serviceman to the Soviet Union since the Vietnam War.

The Pentagon issued a statement, however, saying it was investigating an enlisted man with a name similar to that announced by the Soviets who had deserted in West Germany a month ago. It said it was not certain if he was the same person.

The reported defection came at a time when the U.S. Embassy in Moscow was trying to deal with a spy case in which two former Marine guards have been charged with espionage.

Foreign Ministry spokesman Gennady Gerasimov announced the defection at a regular news briefing and said, "They have chosen the Turkmenian S.S.R. for their honeymoon."

He identified the soldier as William E. Roberts of the U.S. Army, whom he said he had been stationed in West Germany, and his wife as P. Neumann, a West German.

Both have been granted political asylum because "they were afraid of being victimized for their progressive views," Gerasimov said. He said Roberts "had been persecuted" while stationed with the Army in West Germany, but the Soviet spokesman provided no details.

Blaze in mine traps 54, kills 1

MURDOCHVILLE, Quebec — Fire and smoke trapped 54 men overnight in a copper mine directly under this one-industry town and one man died, officials said Thursday. Most took shelter in a lunchroom 2,600 feet down.

The one miner, who had survived previous accidents, was felled by smoke and died before he could reach one of the underground lunchrooms that double as emergency shelters.

Eleven men were brought up into the cold, gray drizzle by early Thursday afternoon and greeted by fellow residents who gathered at the mine gates.

Several hours later, rescuers were waiting for the smoke to clear before trying to reach the remaining 42.

Officials said the miners were safe in several of the lunchrooms, which have water, ventilation and radio telephones.

State hospital awaits recertification

TOPEKA— State lawmakers are holding their breath in anticipation of a report by health agency investigators which Gov. Mike Hayden said Thursday could threaten certification of the Norton State Hospital.

Sen. Wint Winter Jr., R-Lawrence, said he fears Norton may face problems with its certification similar to those recently at the Winfield State Hospital and Training Center.

A multitude of problems at Winfield, the most serious involving abuse of patients and intimidation of staff, led to federal decertification and nearly cost the facility $24,000 per day in Medicaid funds.

Welfare officials say Norton has not experienced the type of patient mistreatment problems as happened at Winfield. Hayden said other problems, including too few staff for the number of patients, may threaten Norton's certification.

Winter, Rep. Sandy Duncan, R-Wichita, and others believe the state should use the problems at its mental retardation facilities to achieve a major revision in state treatment policies.

NATIONAL

Pakistani linked to Iran arms deal

BRIDGEPORT, Conn. — A jury Thursday rejected a claim by a Pakistani national that he was part of the Reagan administration's efforts to trade arms for hostages and found him guilty of illegally exporting missile parts to Iran.

After deliberating for just 80 minutes, a federal jury found Arif A. Durrani, 37, of Westlake Village, Calif., guilty of two counts of exporting weapons without a license and one count of exporting without a registration.

Durrani faces a possible 10 years in prison and a $1 million fine on each count.

His attorneys immediately said they would appeal.

Throughout the trial, Durrani had maintained that he had been part of the government's attempts to trade arms for hostages and had met with former National Security Council aide Lt. Col. Oliver North in London last fall to arrange shipments.

On Wednesday, officials of the Central Intelligence Agency and NSC had refuted Durrani's contention.

Charles Moyer, records management officer for the director of administration for the CIA, said that all of the Hawk missile parts came from the Department of Defense.

North did not travel to London in September 1986, Michael Snedden, an accounting and budgeting analyst with the NSC, testified.

Famed jazz drummer dies at 69

LOS ANGELES — Buddy Rich, the legendary jazz drummer who began his career more than a half-century ago as a vaudeville song-and-dance prodigy, died Thursday. He was 69.

Rich, a self-taught drummer who played with Artie Shaw and Tommy Dorsey before starting his own band, had undergone surgery March 16 at the UCLA Medical Center for a brain tumor and had been undergoing daily chemotherapy treatment at the hospital.

"He had just come back from having treatment, had a seizure, and they took him right back," said family spokesman Jackie Green.

Rich's wife, Marie, and daughter, Cathy, were with him when he died, Green said.

Rich was having a seizure and suffering from extremely low blood pressure when he arrived at the emergency room, said hospital spokesman Rich Elbaum. He died at 2:27 p.m. of unexpected respiratory and cardiac failure, Elbaum said.

Surrogate mother continues fight

RED BANK, N.J. — Surrogate mother Mary Beth Whitehead, stripped of the right to see her daughter again, vowed Thursday to continue her legal battle for the child, saying she'll never stop loving the little girl known as Baby M.

"Until Sara comes home, my fight will continue," Whitehead said haltingly, with tears in her eyes. "We will not accept the decision of one judge as the final determination of a whole society that we should be permanently separated."

"We love each other very much," she said in her first public statement since Tuesday, when Judge Harvey R. Sorkow issued the nation's first ruling upholding a disputed surrogate parenting contract.

"I believe that there is something so wrong and so harmfully unnatural about the surrogate practice that our New Jersey appellate courts will return Sara to me," she said, adding that she will keep the child's crib set up.

Whitehead named the year-old child "Sara," but since Tuesday's historic ruling the baby has been Melissa Elizabeth Stern in the eyes of the law. The biological father, William Stern, won custody and Sorkow, minutes after reading his 121-page decision, allowed Stern's wife, Elizabeth, to adopt the child.

Choir to give spring concert Sunday for parents, Wefald

By The Collegian Staff

Set to entertain President Jon Wefald, the K-State Concert Choir will present its annual President's Concert at 3 p.m. Sunday in All Faiths Chapel.

"This is our spring concert which is done in the name of the president," said Rod Walker, choir director and professor of music.

Walker said the choir's traditional President's Concert began when James McCain was president of the University.

Several of the songs for Sunday's program will also be sung during performances on the choir's tour of Switzerland in May.

Music to be performed includes various sets of pieces and a spiritual composition, "Heaven Bound," by Mark Hayes.

The concert is open to the public with a charge of $2 for adults and $1 for students.

Jell-O dive, Olympic game highlight halls' Spring Fling

By JEANNETTE O'CONNELL
Collegian Reporter

What do the Wacky Olympics and 760 gallons of Jell-O have in common? Both are part of the five-day Area Residence Halls Spring Fling that began Wednesday.

Spring Fling events will continue through Sunday involving 500-600 students in events such as the piggy-back race, the four-legged race and the Jell-O dive.

"The halls have been really motivated this year," said Pam Meyer, junior in social work and Spring Fling chairwoman.

Many of the competing events will be during the Wacky Olympics from 6 p.m. to 8 p.m. Friday on the Goodnow Hall front lawn. Ten coed teams from residence halls will compete in the events.

The Jell-O dive, a new event this year, will be at 9 p.m. Saturday in the street between Boyd and Putnam halls. Eleven divers will plunge into a 6 feet by 8 feet tank containing 760 gallons of Jell-O made by residents of Marlatt Hall. Judging will be based on originality of the dive, enthusiasm of the crowd, costume and donations, Meyer said.

The winner of the event will receive a car stereo donated by Rolling Thunder, 1126 Moro. Donations totaling $1,100 have been collected from hall residents for the Jell-O dive and will be given to the Red Cross Emergency Services.

Spring Fling is a time for students to relax after spring break and before finals, Meyers said. This is the last organized event for the halls this year.

"The students who are involved have a good time (with the games)," Meyer said.

Food services will be closed Saturday for a picnic from 4:45 p.m. to 6:10 p.m. outside Putnam Hall. A dance will follow from 7 p.m. to 11 p.m.

Sunday, a bed race is scheduled to run from the Union across campus to Pittman Building. Participants armed with water balloons and flour to throw at competitors will push and pull eight-10 beds.

A leadership banquet Wednesday evening began the five-day event. One of the new honors presented at the banquet was the President's Award for Excellence. The award, based on community service, campus involvement, ARH and hall involvement went to Goodnow and Putnam halls.

ARH began planning for the Spring Fling events in January, with each residence hall electing its own representative. Support money for Spring Fling comes from the students' $25 contract fee for their room, which is budgeted by ARH for the annual event.

New SelectCard to enhance pay telephone, home utilities

By JONI MANLEY
Collegian Reporter

A new calling card, soon to be distributed by Southwestern Bell Telephone to students and residents of Manhattan, could make using the phone easier.

SelectCard will be introduced gradually into the area. The card will allow customers to utilize features on their home or office phone when calling from a pay phone, said Marcie Wood, Southwestern Bell's north area manager of community relations.

The card is being distributed to people who make more than $50 worth of long-distance calls in the company's service area each month.

The cards are available in a soft flexible version similar to calling cards or a hard plastic card similar to a credit card.

The hard plastic card will contain a magnetic strip that allows the customer to make local or long-distance calls on pay phones without using coins. This also eliminates the need for the customer to dial the card number into the pay phone, Wood said.

With this new card, customers can use their speed dialing codes on a pay phone or they may activate a home security system. Customers can also activate their home heating or air conditioning system from a distant city.

SelectCard is going to replace the calling card currently offered by Southwestern Bell and will play the same role. This new card has no charge and is available to all customers.

The card can be important to students who make frequent long-distance calls home or to friends, Wood said.

The one caution Wood has for students concerning the SelectCard is only the person whose name is on the account can receive a card. Roommates will not be able to receive a card, she said.

The reason is that a roommate could move out, or the card holder may lose the card and calls can still be made without the holder knowing about it, Wood said.

"It is for the protection of the customer that we do not give out a card to roommates," she said.

With a SelectCard, it is also cheaper to make a credit card call because operator assistance is not needed, Wood said.

The SelectCard is currently being marketed in only certain areas of the country, Wood said. Public phones currently using this card are in Houston, Dallas and St. Louis.

"We feel we have the technology here to use the card effectively," she said.

Wood said Southwestern Bell hopes to have the new system working in Manhattan in the next five years.

"The rural areas will take quite awhile before they will be able to receive a service like this," she said.

Customers may receive this new card by contacting their phone company and requesting it, or when a customer opens a new account or obtains a new phone number this card will be available to them, Wood said.

Abductors release tape of U.S. hostage

By The Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Moslem kidnappers released Thursday a videotape showing U.S. hostage Jesse Turner saying his abductors were determined to trade him and three other educators for 400 Arab prisoners in Israel.

Turner, 39, of Boise, Idaho, said Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine was "firm in its demand" that a swap be arranged. The group had claimed responsibility for the Jan. 24 abduction of the four.

But his voice was barely audible in the poor quality, three-minute tape, which was delivered to the independent Beirut newspaper An-Nahar.

Reporters who saw and listened to Turner on the videotape said they were having difficulty transcribing what he said.

But they said he appeared to be making a new appeal to the American administration to put pressure on Israel to arrange the swap so that their lives would be saved.

Previous communiques from the group said hostage Alann Steen, 47, of Boston, was dangerously ill and might die. It cited high blood pressure and breathing difficulties.

The group said Steen's illness prompted it to renew its offer of the swap, which Israel has rejected.

Steen, Turner, fellow American Robert Polhill, 53, of New York City, and Indian Mithileshwar Singh, 60, were kidnapped at the U.S.-affilated Beirut University College in Beirut's Moslem sector. Singh is a legal resident alien of the United States.

The release of the new tape came a few hours after students rallied on campus to demand the release of the four teachers held hostage for 68 days.

Twenty-four foreigners, including eight Americans, are missing in Lebanon and believed kidnapped since March 1985. Also missing is Anglican Church envoy Terry Waite, who dropped from sight Jan. 20.

Graduation provides return to reality

Editor's note: This is the first of a two-part series about post-graduation. It will conclude next Friday.

Since I am winding down my college career (for the second time), I thought it might be fun to share some of my "real" world experiences and views. Graduation may be just around the corner but so is my return to a safe, sane reality.

I realize many of you have no concept of what is on the other side of academic life. A traditional college senior has spent the last 16 years in classrooms. It's trying and difficult to be a student and in the same vocation for so many years. Believe me, I remember.

What college student hasn't spent endless hours working on one project for one class while the rest of the semester's schedule goes by the wayside? Which one of us has dealt with one thing at a time — with only that one item on our future agenda? It's not easy being a student, expected to juggle so many items at once.

Most of us not only have to worry about classwork but jobs — hopefully, paying jobs — as well. The classroom is hard enough, what with instructors who feel their one class is all we have to worry about, dashes across campus to make it to class on time and paper after paper to write.

No, that's not enough for a typical student. We have to worry about the rent, the utilities and other assorted bills. We have to worry about mundane things like money, food, cars, apartments/rooms and roommates. We have to worry about everything — including classes.

But where would college students be without fun? We'd be in straightjackets before the first semester finished. We need the time off, the time to socialize. It's the only balance to the hassles of college life.

It's just too bad so many of us think the fun is the only "real" part of college.

You realize college is not the real world. I hope most of you realize that fact. Unfortunately, I have a feeling a majority of you have no idea what awaits you.

Many of those I work with and have classes with will have major difficulties once they leave the safe isolation of college. Yes, I said safe isolation. Isolation from the world and what's happening in the world. Isolation from people, from places, from events and things. College is a very small corner of the world. It's isolated and students are barricaded in, wih no access to the rest of the world.

The time I was most informed about the world was the three years I spent working in production for a network affiliate in Nebraska. I had to spend the time in the control room doing whatever production work was needed. There was no escape from the video and audio of what the network was airing. I spent time actually watching and listening to the morning news program and the evening newscasts. Plus I never missed a special bulletin or the local news — the last is an "of course," since I directed most of those.

What I'm getting at is that as a college student I was so overwhelmed by classes and the hassles of college life. It was impossible for me to keep tuned to what was outside the little niche I had carved for myself. The rest of the world had to wait while I prepared to face it after graduation.

The rest of the world is on hold again. I'm preparing to face a "real" world after two years in isolation. I may be hassled by the college life and I may be in a state of shock since the experience is finally coming to a close, but I can hardly wait to spring from this shell of academia.

I also have an advantage over many of you. I've been there before.

I've been through the hassles of interviews, of pounding the pavement, of looking for and finding my first job. I've been through the pain of moving and settling into a completely new environment. I've been through the agony of the first year in the real world.

You may not believe me now but the first year away from college will be an experience. You will change so fast, you won't know yourself. I just hope they are the right changes.

The first year is one filled with heartache and pain. It's a year filled with discoveries and wonder.

Right now, we have to worry about finishing school, about finals and about finding a job. Simple things like that. You don't have to worry about the real world yet, but just wait. It's waiting for you.

If you manage to make it through the interview process while still attending classes, my congratulations. You are undoubtedly in a major which provides you with endless contacts, interviews on campus and plant trips. That's great. Those, however, are luxuries those of us in mass media rarely find.

Mass communications is a strange business. In television, if the job opening has two weeks notice, we're lucky. The old resume has to find its way to the person who is hiring at just the right moment. If it isn't viewed at the exact instant the person is looking for a new employee, it probably will be lost in a round file or the back of a filing cabinet.

Now for me, television might be relatively easy to get back into. My four years of actual television experience and two years of teaching should account for something. But I'm not looking for television production work. I've moved to another area of television which is more difficult to break into — television promotion.

Back to job hunting. You've interviewed a thousand times, you've had to be nice and polite to a thousand people you'll never see again, you've had to dress in that suit more times than you care to count. But you finally have a job.

Great! Now what? Now the fun begins.

Next week — a look at what to expect.

Proposal to reduce fee shifts burden to future

As the cost of attending college has been spiraling to record tuition levels every year, students may finally receive some financial relief beginning next semester.

A proposal initiated by the central administration could slash student fees for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum by half the amount being paid this semester.

George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, has proposed the plan that would reduce the coliseum fees from $16.50 to $8.50 — the net savings could allow each student to buy Cyndi Lauper's latest album.

The current coliseum fees were originated in 1982 with the plan of having students pay $7 million for the coliseum. Since 1982, the current fee plan has generated $2.2 million including interest on those fees. Additionally, refinancing of coliseum bonds during 1985 freed another $2.8 million for the coliseum.

This total of $5 million means only $2 million more in student fees is needed for the coliseum.

Even with the reduction in the student fees, the plan Miller has proposed projects that by 1993 enough student fee monies will be collected to pay the $2 million.

Increased student enrollment and interest rates could mean the termination of the student coliseum fee before 1993.

Miller's action should be taken as a positive sign by the students at K-State.

In the face of a 3 percent tuition increase slated for the 1987 fall semester and an increase in student line item fees, students may finally see some relief in how much they have to pay next semester. Even though the $8.50 amount might seem small by those standards, the administration should be applauded for attempting to reduce tuition rates.

We should give the administration a vote of confidence especially with the possibility that many students might receive less financial aid from the government next semester.

The coliseum fee reduction would also mean students at the University now will pay less for a coliseum they may never utilize. Instead some of the financial burden should be inherited by the students of tomorrow — these are the people who will use the coliseum.

We should all support Miller, who will submit the recommendations in front of the Board of Regents — and hope they act accordingly.

Jury's Baby M verdict reaffirms contract law

The jury has spoken.

Tuesday, the jury in the now famous "Baby M" case in Hackensack, N.J., ruled in favor of Baby M's father. Pitted in the legal confrontation were Mary Beth Whitehead, Baby M's surrogate mother, and William Stern, the infant's father.

Whitehead broke a contract made with Stern to "sell" Baby M for $10,000 and Stern sued for breach of contract.

The jury's verdict was appropriate.

Whitehead agreed in advance to the contract, and the terms of that contract were not unclear. She knew she had to give the baby up at birth.

Unfortunately, she grew attached to the baby and refused to relinquish it. Hence, the suit.

The jury's verdict reaffirms the value of the contract in general and the validity of this agreement specifically. Baby M belongs with her father, not with a greedy woman willing to sacrifice the baby's future.

Flag symbolizes 'oppression'

DAVE KINGSLEY
Guest Columnist

In America at this time there is an amazing insensitivity to assaults on human dignity. Racism and other forms of human degradation have become tolerable and even, at times, cloaked in some form of seemingly legitimate political philosophy. A recent example of this salient feature of American culture in the 1980s is the large confederate flag that I noticed hanging in a window at Goodnow Hall. This is clearly a symbol of hate and oppression. The fact that there is little outrage generated by its existence on campus says something about attitudes in society in general and on this campus in particular.

The acceptance of a symbol such as this says to me that we have either failed to study history or that we have failed to learn anything important. When I hear vague garbage about how the confederate flag symbolizes Southern life and culture and has nothing to do with the most vicious system of slavery ever instituted in the history of the human race, I wonder what has gone awry in the learning of American history.

The flag that is being displayed constantly in this community and in this institution of higher learning represents the so-called "old Confederacy." There is no doubt in my mind that the "old Confederacy" is the moral equivalent of the "old Third Reich."

The states that existed under the Confederacy that tore this country apart attempted to excuse human bondage and genocide by developing political ideology vastly different from that espoused in the Constitution and other documents which purport to set forth the basic tenets of American government. Admittedly, our espousals are often incongruent with our deeds. Nevertheless, those who refuse to accept racist, sexist and other anti-democratic governmental actions have a legitimate ideology that strengthens their case.

This would not be true if the Southern states had prevailed during the Civil War. Afro-Americans were considered subhumans by pseudo-scientific arguments that became intertwined with the political philosophy of Calhoun and others who served as the guiding lights in the development of political justification for an atrocity that is equal to the German holocaust in its viciousness, i.e., American slavery. The magnitude of both of these historical events is actually incomprehensible in terms of human suffering.

There may be a certain innocence involved on the part of those individuals who feel compelled to display the confederate flag. Nevertheless, unintentional acts of abuse of ethnic groups are just as hurtful as intentional acts. Therefore, there must be attempts to enlighten students about the meaning of certain historical events and the meaning of the symbols that represent those events.

This University has issued strict guidelines to faculty and staff concerning sexism and the language and symbols which accompany that form of human degradation. I fully support this. It would seem, however, as though the same action would be appropriate in regard to racism and any other human rights violation.

Some people may argue that prohibiting the display of swastikas, confederate flags and other such degrading symbols violates their right or the right of others to freedom of speech. Their point is well taken. If that argument were to prevail, then I would argue that it is incumbent upon the University to wage an educational campaign designed to raise consciousness and awareness vis-a-vis racism and the meaning of certain symbols.

Maybe what we failed to learn from the Holocaust is that silence and ignorance are as deadly as a mad man who can move people to their deaths with a remarkable and ghastly efficiency. My observation of events in the past decade tell me that it is far past the time for ending silence and ignorance.

Lives in danger

Editor,

I would like to commend you on your excellent coverage of what is probably the most serious issue that Kansas has ever had to deal with; the disposal of nuclear waste.

Currently, we (the people of Kansas) are part of a five-state compact formed to deal with this problem, safely, intelligently and completely. But to my knowledge they are failing on all three accounts.

The compact committee has chosen Kansas as the main target for a waste dump for all five states. But in their decision they have ignored that the Kansas sites chosen are geologically unsound for a waste dump, and that Kansas is the lowest producer of low-level nuclear waste.

So why should we get the dump? It sounds to me like we are getting shafted, and I am insulted the compact (based in Atlanta, Ga.) thinks they can put one over on us. They should dump the waste wherever it is produced, because the states that produce it are the ones who benefit from it.

Some forms of low-level radioactive waste remain deadly for millions of years. But I am worried about 10 years down the road. One ounce of plutonium 239 alone is enough to kill 20,000 people. When one half of the low-level radioactive waste dumps in this country have been shut down because they are leaking, why should we believe that the one they are trying to put in Kansas will be any different?

Let's stand up for our lives.

I urge you to sign the petition that is circulating around campus and around the state of Kansas.

Italian entrepreneur finds success in Aggieville pizza place

Falsetto worked at this restaurant for nine years when, after suffering a considerable degree of burnout in the Italian food business, he decided to join the U.S. Army and work toward an education.

"We didn't know to do anything else, so you just went to work and that was it.

"Then I burned out and went into to the Army...for school. I guess you could say I suffered the Dick Vermeil syndrome of pasta and pizza," he said.

Dick Vermeil coached the Philadelphia Eagles to the 1980 Superbowl where they fell in defeat to the Oakland Raiders. Vermeil had reached the point of burnout in the coaching ranks of football, so he retired and became a television sports announcer.

It wasn't until after 6½ years in the Army that Falsetto again decided to get back into the Italian food business. This time, though, it was in Ogden.

"My wife was pregnant with my daughter Angie, and I was trying to make some extra money for her," Falsetto said. "I was getting out of the Army, and I knew I had to do this.

"(I knew a guy) who had a little frozen pizza store and sandwich shop, Herb Clark was his name. He wasn't feeling well so I told him I could make it 'sing,' and I talked to my boss in the Army and he let me get off work every day early, and I'd go in every night and make it 'sing.' Herb Clark I'll treasure all my life. He gave me a chance to prove my word and a break that got me back into the business."

A break indeed, for Falsetto never intended for this part-time job to lead to private entrepreneurship. It was just a scheme to gain pocket cash while finishing out his tour in the Army. He had, instead, made plans to become a police officer in Bellevue, Wash.

"(The Ogden business) was a real break for me," he said. "(If it weren't for that) I'd be a policeman right now in Bellevue, Wash., making $25,000 a year. I had already taken all the tests and was accepted for about three or four positions."

The Ogden job started the wheels rolling for Falsetto. So, with the necessity to get a bigger apartment for his growing family, he decided to bypass the police academy, set up residence in Manhattan and start a pizza shop.

Staff/Rob Squires

John Falsetto, owner of Falsetto's Pizza and Falsetto's Italian Pasta House, throws dough into shape. Falsetto opened his pizzeria in August 1984.

"I wanted to be in Manhattan because I wanted to sell slices and I needed foot traffic to do it," he said. "PTA (Pizza Transit Authority) asked me if I'd take over their lease so I did, and they left."

With the opening of his own shop Aug. 19, 1984, Falsetto said he laid all his personal savings on the line to buy two ovens, a pizza mixer and the necessary extra equipment, which he leased. He didn't have money for paint, seating or any of the luxuries normally taken for granted, he said.

"I was scared to death," Falsetto said. "Then I became really scared eight months later when we didn't have any business. I had no air conditioning; it was hotter than hell, and you couldn't give a slice of pizza away."

It was then that Falsetto began to tap the most available resource in Manhattan — the students of K-State.

"I learned a lot from the students. I didn't really know of the competitiveness of the franchises because they're no factor where I come from...an area with a lot of Italian people.

"I didn't know one thing about marketing. Some students would come in that were majoring in marketing and they'd say 'John, you have great pizza, but no one knows to order it by delivery.' They gave me all the ideas, then I would follow up on them. Later on in that next year business just exploded."

With new knowledge of how to run a business, Falsetto systematically began implementing changes into his shop. Free delivery, extensive advertising and seating were part of the initial phase, but he refused to change the atmosphere. It is an atmosphere, he says, that is conducive to conversation, lounging around with friends or challenging the owner in a game of chess. It is similar, he says, to that of standup bars in Italy.

"In Italy there are a lot of little standup bars where you go in and talk about the day...you don't even sit down. Back when we opened up we didn't have any seating, and that didn't go over so well. We finally got seating after about a year."

It was also in Italy that he received many ideas of how to prepare Italian food — the authentic way.

"When I was in Naples, Italy, I visited the first pizzeria in the world, an old brick building. We make our pizza almost the same way they do. We make our dough by hand. Our sauce is about the same — made with wine, but we put more toppings on than they do. They don't put as much cheese on their pizza."

Falsetto is the first to admit that preparing pizza his way costs him much more money in labor and time. But it is his exceptional product, he said, that is the reason for his success.

"We are one of the last places in the country to make our dough by hand, as well as our sauce and sausages. If I were to change I could cut labor costs by one-third, but that would change my product and my product is the reason for my success."

With the success of the pizza shop, Falsetto has recently taken on a partner, J.D. Kennedy, and opened a full-scale Italian pasta house, Falsetto's Italian Pasta House at 2304 Stagg Hill Road. There he expects the same degree of quality and serves only what the customer expects to be served — authentic Italian pasta.

His wife Maria, daughter Angie, 3, and son Tommy, 2, are his number one priority, he said.

With things moving along at a rapid pace, one might imagine Falsetto's next step would be to expand beyond Manhattan. This isn't the case, though. By expanding, he said, the emphasis on his brand of product might be lost, and that is something he won't tolerate.

"I don't think you'll see another Falsetto's anyplace else than Aggieville, Manhattan. It's too difficult to keep efficient high quality. You may see another Falsetto's Pasta House."

All of his success, he said, is due to locating in Manhattan. And it is here that he wants his kids to grow up and go to school.

"I don't want to tempt my fate...and my fate was Manhattan."

Study links menstrual cycle, chocolate yen

By SANDRA M. SIEBERT
Collegian Reporter

For chocolate lovers, America is the land of chocolate milk and Hershey's. Hundreds of types of chocolate candies can be found, ranging from candy bars in vending machines to chocolates imported from around the world.

Now a study at the University has linked women's craving for chocolate to their time of menstruation.

The study was the subject of an article published in the March issue of the "Journal of the American Dietetic Association." It was written by Katharine Grunewald, associate professor of foods and nutrition, and Regina Tomelleri, who recently received her master's degree in foods and nutrition at K-State.

"We really don't have a good explanation (why women crave chocolate at that time)," Grunewald said. "But this study has shown that they do."

There has been some speculation that women crave chocolate because it contains magnesium, an essential mineral in the human diet, she said. Two ounces of chocolate contain 40-60 milligrams of magnesium. The recommended daily requirement for adult women is 300 milligrams of magnesium.

This is a significant amount of magnesium, especially because people don't think of candy as having any nutritional value, Grunewald said.

However, the presence of magnesium in chocolate does not explain why women crave the candy during menstruation. Women usually are deficient in iron and calcium at that time, but not in magnesium, she said.

Chocolate also contains stimulants such as caffeine, theobromine and other drug-like compounds which exert physiological effects on the body. Grunewald said these pharmacological ingredients are probably not present in sufficient amounts to explain the craving for chocolate.

"It's simply possible that women (might) crave chocolate during (menstruation) because they feel uncomfortable and they feel justified in craving chocolate," she said.

The subjects in the study were 83 students in Grunewald's basic nutrition class. All of the women were white, age 18-26 and single.

Students completed questionnaires listing typical American foods such as hot dogs and chocolate cake. For this reason, students with a foreign cultural background were not used in the study, she said. If a person is unfamiliar with a food, it is unlikely she would have a craving for it.

Every Wednesday for six weeks the subjects completed questionnaires. Students were asked to indicate the degree to which they craved certain foods on a scale of one to seven, with one being no craving and seven an extreme craving.

The menstrual cycle was divided into four stages: menstrual flow, the first half of the cycle excluding menstrual flow, the second half of the cycle excluding the premenstrual phase and the one-week premenstrual phase.

The questions were asked so the subjects would not be aware that the survey was to determine the relationship between the menstrual cycle and food cravings, Grunewald said.

"PMS has been a really popular subject in magazines recently and most women have heard about it," she said. "We didn't want them to think about what they should crave when they weren't craving at all."

This study was different from many other similar studies because the others focused only on the PMS phase.

"We wanted to look at the whole cycle," Grunewald said.

Speaker notes harassment by pro-lifers

By DORI WITHERS
Collegian Reporter

Anti-choice demonstrators have harassed women's abortion services clinics through picket lines, phone calls, and even bombs.

Adele Hughey, executive director of the Comprehensive Health Associates in Overland Park, said the abortion clinic has had a variety of experiences with harassers. Hughey spoke at noon Thursday in the Union as part of pro-choice week.

The Manhattan National Organization for Women and the Women's Resource Center are sponsoring the pro-choice week, which began March 30.

Anti-choice demonstrators usually plan to picket outside the clinic at least one day of the year, she said.

"The date legalizing abortion, Jan. 22, almost always includes some type of demonstration," Hughey said.

In 1985, five men chained themselves to the facility's door, and the police were called to remove them after they refused to leave peacefully.

"People will do anything to create a delay or make it appear that we are not in control," Hughey said.

Hughey said Saturday is the most popular day for demonstrators to protest, unless a special anti-choice group is in town during the week for business meetings or religious conventions.

Many of the anti-choice demonstrators are fundamental Christians, she said.

"One man from Parsons, Kan., sends us a postcard every six months or so with Bible verses crammed on it," she said.

When Hughey was pregnant with twins, some anonymous group sent out fake baby shower invitations to other employees of the facility.

Employees at the clinic have received phone calls at home occasionally, and doctors' homes have been picketed.

The center has received one bomb threat, she said, but no other violent attempts have been made.

"Picketing has really died down in the last couple of years at our facility, although Planned Parenthood still gets a lot," she said.

Hughey said the police department is very cooperative during the demonstrations.

"They are out in no time when we call," she said. "We appreciate their support because in some areas on the coast police are known to give coffee to demonstrators."

The law requires them to warn demonstrators once before they can call for a warrant for arrest. Police usually take photographs of those who are warned, dating the photos in order to have a record of the harassers if they cause trouble in the future, Hughey said.

"When someone makes trouble, we have to be sure to report it," she said. "They know we mean business. It's not anyone's right to prevent anyone else from seeking medical care."

Actors to celebrate 'womanhood'

By The Collegian Staff

The Manhattan Civic Theater will close its season with "A... My Name is Alice," a celebration of womanhood in the 1980s.

The production will open tonight at 8 p.m. in the basement of the Manhattan City Auditorium, 11th Street and Poyntz Avenue. After a performance Saturday evening, it will continue next weekend, April 10-11.

The play is a series of scenes dealing with various aspects of women's lives, such as men, other women and old age. Scenes feature comic, as well as poignant, aspects.

The great variety of music in the play comes from two dozen writers and 20 songs, said Linda Uthoff, actress with the theater.

The play consists of a lot of local talent, Uthoff said. Many have performed not only in the Manhattan Civic Theater, but also on other stages.

"We not only have people who have performed before but a few newcomers, and it has been a good experience to work with them," she said.

This play is about women, but men would find it enjoyable, and it will leave them laughing, said Linda Broderson, stage manager.

"There have been many plays that have poked fun at men, but this one doesn't," she said. "Seventy-five percent of it is hilarious, and 25 percent is very touching and will leave tears in your eyes."

"I have never been a stage manager before, but this experience has influenced me to do it again," Broderson said.

"The play has very talented young women who are all experienced in performing in some way or another," said director Edith Hinrichs. "It has been an absolute delight to work with these women, and I feel very lucky to have such a talented cast."

"The play has been a real good experience," Uthoff said. "We welcomed back Edith Hinrichs, who has been away for quite a while."

Admission cost is $4 for adults, $3 for students and senior citizens. Ticket reservations can be made by calling 776-8591.

AIDS: 'value-loaded disease' says historian

By DERON JOHNSON
Collegian Reporter

As an escalating number of people die from AIDS and medical authorities scramble to combat the most frightening disease of this century, the social reactionary debate is just beginning.

That debate and the answers it yields will be one of the most difficult for this or any other generation, said Sue Zschoche, assistant professor of history. Zschoche, a social historian, teaches History of American Medicine.

She said acquired immune deficiency syndrome is unique because it is a "value-loaded disease." It received this designation because of its preliminary exclusive association with the homosexual community.

"There is a long history of diseases perceived to have moral implications," she said. One such disease is tuberculosis, which at one time was associated with the poor.

"AIDS is really similar in that regard," she said. "The culture has to make sense of the disease" in order to combat it.

She said the disagreement between Secretary of Education William Bennett and Surgeon General C. Everett Koop on how to avoid AIDS reflects the confused response to the disease.

'There is a long history of diseases perceived to have moral implications.'
— Sue Zschoche

"That's an indication of how value-loaded it is," Zschoche said.

Bennett believes abstinence is the only way to avoid AIDS, while Koop has taken what some believe to be a more realistic stand by advocating the use of condoms.

Koop also said the free distribution of needles to intravenous drug users is a proposal worth consideration. Besides sex, intravenous drug use with shared needles is the most common way to contract the AIDS virus, medical authorities say.

Zschoche believes America has begun the process of dealing with the disease and its myriad implications.

"The fact that there is debate now among heterosexuals about sexual contacts and the limits of promiscuity strikes me that we are trying to come to terms with it," she said. However, she cautioned, society may never come to terms with AIDS.

She said there are a number of vital questions — such as the economic consequences of AIDS, civil rights and the constitutional right to privacy — that have yet to be answered.

"We haven't even begun to deal with stuff like that," Zschoche said. "My guess is that in the next 10 years we're going to be involved in a horrendous social debate."

In addition, Zschoche said it will be difficult to implement policies because it is much easier to deal in theory than in reality.

"Formulating reactions will be the most difficult thing we could imagine," she said. And the likelihood this country will see a miracle cure, which would eliminate the problem before any reactions are needed, is slim, she said.

"Maybe there will be a Salk vaccine, but I doubt it," Zschoche said, referring to Jonas Salk, a physician who developed a vaccine to prevent polio.

Although AIDS was first detected by 1978, the disease didn't come into national prominence until the early 1980s. The protests by some — mostly from the homosexual community — that society was responding slowly to AIDS because it was considered a homosexual-only disease, may not be justified, Zschoche said.

"At the time, I don't think anyone understood how serious it was in terms of its spreading ability," she said. "The disease was so poorly understood that there may not have been a real notion of how fast it would spread."

However, in the five years since the disease was recognized as generation-threatening, Zschoche said an amazing amount of progress has been made. For instance, within the past two weeks the AIDS drug AZT received approval from the Food and Drug Administration. Zschoche said this approval was granted in record time.

"The response has really accelerated," she said. "I think the response may have been slow (at first) for other reasons."

However, Zschoche left no doubt: Society has a very long way to go in dealing with the disease, which could have a human death toll of millions within the next five years.

"We're beginning the process, but so long as the disease gets worse I don't think we can predict how far the discussion will have to go. My guess is that it will get a lot worse before it gets better," she said. "If this thing spreads, we could be looking on the wide scale at fairly awful choices."

Historically, AIDS is not the worst disease humanity has faced — at least not yet. Zschoche said Europe's bubonic plague in the 14th century was worse.

"Many people thought it was the end of the world," she said. "The only thing we have going for us is our hope — or expectation — that medicine will find out how to deal with AIDS."

Even though the diagnosis of AIDS is an instant death sentence, Zschoche said she doesn't believe heterosexuals — unlike homosexuals — have changed their lifestyle.

'At some point we're going to have to live with the fact that we're all in this together.'
— Sue Zschoche

"The things I've read and the research I've seen seems to indicate that (heterosexuals) are talking about (AIDS) a lot," she said, "but they are not doing anything."

She said the first step in dealing with the problem is recognizing the disease is real. The second step is altering the lifestyle in response to it. How will heterosexuals get from the point of realization to the point of reaction?

"A lot of dead people will get them to that point," Zschoche said. "It's a threat right now, not reality."

Zschoche said homosexuals resented being singled out when AIDS first surfaced. "Horrible comments" such as AIDS being a punishment from God perpetuated the discrimination. Currently, incidents of "gay bashing," a phenomenon where heterosexuals assault suspected homosexuals, have increased.

Zschoche said the assaults are not a result of any particular development. AIDS is the excuse the attackers have been waiting for, she said.

"It was always going on."

However, the spread of the disease to the heterosexual population is evening out the odds, she said.

"At some point," Zschoche said, "we're going to have to live with the fact that we're all in this together."

Fear creates AIDS bias, counselor says

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

People with AIDS must face the wrath of society as well as the reality of dying, said Jeff Martin, psychologist at Sloan Kettering Cancer Center and Cornell University Medical College in New York.

"People who have AIDS feel very socially isolated and often times think of themselves as social lepers," said Martin to an audience of about 30 Thursday night in Denison Hall.

Martin, who received his doctorate in counseling from K-State last May, said AIDS patients are shunned because of misunderstanding and fear of contracting the disease through casual contact.

But the virus can only be transmitted by entering the blood stream and cannot be contracted in a social setting, he said.

While married monogomous couples have no reason to fear contracting AIDS, young, sexually active college students do, Martin said.

People who test positive for the AIDS virus antibody but have no related symptoms have a "sword hanging over their head," because they have the virus but no way of knowing whether they will contract the disease, he said. These individuals have developed antibodies to the virus which have thus far protected them against the disease.

People who have the AIDS-Related Complex suffer more anxiety than AIDS patients because they have come closer to developing AIDS, Martin said.

ARC-inflicted individuals already have a damaged immune system but have not been infected with an opportunistic infection, he said. An opportunistic infection is one that does not affect a healthy individual but usually becomes fatal in AIDS patients.

About 10 percent of people with AIDS do not develop an opportunistic infection but are infected in the brain.

People with AIDS have less stress because they at least "know what's going on," Martin said.

However, knowing the truth does not prevent deep feelings of depression and isolation typical of people with AIDS, he said.

Martin said there is a theory of four stages people go through after discovering they have AIDS. The first stage is denial and anger. The person asks, "How did I ever let this happen to myself?"

Next comes a transitional stage where denial is replaced with depression and/or anxiety. Third, as effects of the disease progress, the patient comes "to grips with the fact that he or she has physical limitations."

The last step is anticipation of death. In this phase the patient is more concerned with being independent and relieving as much pain as possible, he said.

Homosexuals account for about 75 percent of the approximate 33,000 cases of AIDS in America. This figure sometimes gives heterosexuals a false sense of security and they are usually caught off guard if they contract the disease, Martin said.

Martin is currently working with a family in which both the mother and child have AIDS and the father has the virus but is asymptomatic.

While still single, the father had one sexual encounter with a gay man when he was drunk, Martin said. He infected his wife, who in turn infected her unborn child. The family did not discover their affliction until the child was diagnosed with AIDS after suffering various infections, he said.

The family is very close, but "the husband has to live day to day knowing what he's done to his family," Martin said.

"Believe it or not," there are some positive aspects of AIDS, Martin said.

The vast array of AIDS research overlaps into other fields, including additional immune deficiency diseases and cancer, he said. In addition, AIDS is helping people work out problems in relationships "as opposed to going out and seeking immediate gratification from someone else," Martin said.

Sometimes, the best part of a golf game is making up excuses as to why the score wasn't as good as it could have been.

Excuses were a dime-a-dozen Thursday afternoon at the Manhattan Country Club after five-man teams from K-State, Emporia State and Marymount College completed the first-round of play in the K-State/Pepsi Men's Golf Classic.

Strong winds out of the north and cool temperatures pushed scores well above normal and shortened the opening-round of play from 36 to 27 holes.

K-State Coach Rob Sedorcek said the weather was to blame as not one player broke par the entire afternoon.

"The players had a lot of clothes on so they're not able to swing as freely, and the ball doesn't travel as far in cold weather," Sedorcek said. "There's a lot more variables to consider when you play in this kind of weather."

Weather aside, the Wildcats carded a 478 and managed to grab a 6-stroke lead over defending NAIA District 10 Champion Emporia State heading into today's final 18-hole round that begins at 9 a.m.

Marymount came in third at 510, and Creighton University canceled out of its appearance.

Sedorcek said the Manhattan Country Club course — par-70, 6,297 yards — is extremely difficult when the wind is out of the north.

"There's 10 holes, all par 4s, where the north wind makes a big difference," he said. "If the wind is out of the south, you use a driver and then a wedge or 9-iron (to reach the green). Players today on those holes were using a driver, then a 6-iron or 7-iron. That's a four-club difference because of the wind."

It was the K-State men's season opener, but it was the third outing of the season for Emporia State, which has been to the NAIA national meet the past two years.

Emporia State Coach Ken Roper said his team was "not out of the running by any stretch." He said his team's main difficulty in this tournament was adjusting to playing sans winter rules. In winter rules, players are allowed to improve their lie in fairway play.

"It's a psychological disadvantage, if anything. The player looks down there and thinks 'Hey, I can't touch that ball' instead of thinking of the shot."

But Roper said the Hornets, defending District 10 champions, are potentially as strong as ever.

"I think we have a shot at going to nationals again if we just hang in there," he said.

Track meet to highlight area's finest

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

For the first time this season, K-State's track teams will compete against a majority of their Big Eight Conference opponents Saturday in the KSU/Pepsi Open at R.V. Christian Track.

Both men's and women's teams from Iowa State, Kansas, Oklahoma State and Nebraska will be present for tomorrow's event. Joining conference squads with full men's and women's squads will be Central Missouri State and the University of South Dakota.

Drake University and Morning Side (Sioux City, Iowa) will be represented in the men's division. The University of Arkansas and Nebraska-Omaha will bring women's teams only. Team scores will not be kept.

"Originally we only had six or seven teams coming, then we added a couple of more...Drake and Nebraska decided to come," head track coach John Capriotti said.

"It's turning out to be a very competitive meet, so we expect to see a lot of good individual marks out there this weekend."

Highlighting performers for K-State will be Kenny Harrison on the men's side and Pinkie Suggs in the women's division. Both are coming off outstanding performances at the NCAA Indoor Championships where Harrison finished second in the triple jump and third in the long jump, and Suggs placed third in the shot put.

Big Eight track and field bests so far this season show 10 Wildcat athletes on the men's side ranked No. 8 or better in their respective events.

Leading K-State's men are Brad Speer in the high jump at 6-foot-11, and Doug Brown with a conference-leading toss of 211-8 in the javelin.

Nebraska, which recently won the Big Eight indoor track championship, will most likely have the strongest field in the meet. Of the 20 events recorded this outdoor season, Nebraska's men leads in conference bests with 11.

The meet will get under way Saturday with the men's javelin slated to begin at 9 a.m. Running events are scheduled to begin at 11 a.m.

OU baseball team looks to top 'Cats

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

Oklahoma is not a team any coach would like to try to extend a winning streak against, but K-State's baseball team will attempt to build on its two-game winning streak this weekend when it plays the Sooners.

K-State, 12-10 overall and 0-1 in Big Eight Conference play, will test the nationally ranked Oklahoma Sooners, 20-6, in a four-game series Saturday and Sunday at Mitchell Park in Norman, Okla.

Double-headers are scheduled to start at noon Saturday and 12:30 p.m. Sunday.

For the Sooners — ranked fifth nationally in the ESPN/Collegiate Baseball poll and a traditional baseball powerhouse — it is their Big Eight season opener.

But Oklahoma is coming off a 14-13 loss Wednesday to Oral Roberts University, coached by ex-K-State mentor Gary Vaught.

"With OU, if we play to our capabilities, we'll be in a position to win," K-State Coach Mike Clark said.

"Talent-wise, they've got an edge on us, but as long as we play up to our capabilities, that's all we can ask of the kids. The double-header Wednesday showed we can play good baseball."

In that double-header Wednesday, the Wildcats beat Southwest Missouri State 7-4 and 2-0 at Frank Myers Field.

"I am glad we are opening (conference play) at home," Sooners' Coach Enos Semore said. "These are the games that count and it is obviously important to get off to a good start. Kansas State has been competitive in almost every game this season and we certainly don't take them for granted because of past success."

Success is an understatement.

Oklahoma has won 22 straight and 32 of the last 34 games with the 'Cats, and the Sooners have not lost a conference inaugural game since 1980.

"We'll try to approach the games positively," Clark said. "We have nothing to lose. We're not going to do any worse than they've done earlier."

Clark said starting pitchers for K-State Saturday will be Paul Iseman (1-1) and Mike Hamacher (2-0). Sunday, Jeff Peterson (3-2) and Mike Hinkle (2-0) will be on the mound.

K-State's pitching corps, ranked seventh in the Big Eight, is something Clark has concern about going against Oklahoma, which is first in the conference in team batting.

Injuries to pitchers Rocky Ferguson and Darryl Rowley have thinned the throwing ranks. Rowley has not thrown for three weeks because of a muscle strain; Ferguson has calcium deposits in his pitching elbow.

Clark said he hopes to have Rowley and Ferguson healthy for the series with Kansas April 11-12. Until then, he will have to make due — especially this weekend — when Wildcat hitters will be facing Oklahoma's Jack Armstrong (5-1), who Clark said is one of the "top pitchers in the nation." Armstrong ranks first in the Big Eight in strikeouts with 58.

Clark converted the outfielder Hinkle and first baseman Hamacher to pitchers to help fill gaps in the rotation.

Beware of football's Bermuda Triangle

DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

It is called the triangle of ill fate — a danger zone that has called home countless ships and aircraft leaving them just a notation on a report — "lost at sea." Yes, I am talking about the Bermuda Triangle.

Named for the area that extends from the Florida Keys to the Bermuda Islands to an unspecified point in the West Indies (around Puerto Rico), ship and aircraft captains to this day avoid this doomsday territory.

Just a myth? Quite possibly, but on a trip to Kansas City, Mo., to cover the Big Eight Conference men's basketball championships, I learned of a new Bermuda Triangle — one that hits much closer to home.

While milling about the hospitality room at the Hyatt Regency, I saw a most peculiar sight.

Several sports writers had cornered the University of Kansas' Sports Information Director, Doug Vance, and presented him with a plaque enscribed "The Bermuda Triangle Award."

This was a bit confusing to me until I remembered reading about "The Bermuda Triangle" in a story regarding Big Eight football teams Kansas, Missouri and K-State.

"The Bermuda Triangle" is a term coined by Kansas City Star/Times sports writer Steve Richardson who made the presentation to Vance. Basically, what it deals with is last season's lackluster showing by the three football teams.

The award, Richardson said, goes to the team within the three-school belt that has the worst record in round-robin competiion. Kansas earned the award since it was defeated by both Missouri and K-State.

A fair and justifiable award, sure. But could it, does it, go further than that?

It's possible there may be something mysterious about these three football teams. Let's take a look at some quick stats.

Last year, the combined record of the three teams was 8-25. Any eyebrows raised?

Further, the only conference games won by the three were within the triangle. K-State was 1-6 in the Big Eight, Missouri 2-5 and Kansas 0-7. This leads to even more speculation of the triangle's power.

You may recall the pyramid of power, the triangle-shaped good-luck charm that some people swear brings good luck. Could it be possible that when conference opponents enter the territory that stretches between Manhattan and Columbia, Mo., they may draw the power of the pyramid and rise to victory every Saturday afternoon?

K-State Coach Stan Parrish doesn't seem to think so. Parrish said he remembered reading Richardson's story that mentioned the triangle, but doesn't recall giving it much thought.

"I think that it was just sarcastic humor," Parrish said. "Some sportswriters tend to have a flare for the dramatic...I have better things to do with the time in my day than think about those kind of things."

Understandable, but the mystery still remains.

K-State's tennis team to start in Big 8 play

By The Collegian Staff

It's a no-lose situation for the K-State women's tennis team Friday and Saturday when they open the Big Eight Conference season with Oklahoma and Oklahoma State, Coach Steve Bietau said.

It's a no-lose situation, even though the odds are against the Wildcats, 5-4, in both matches.

"It's a no-lose situation for us," Bietau said. "If we lose it really doesn't change anything about where we are. But if we do win some games, then we've pulled off an upset."

The match with Oklahoma gets under way at 1 p.m. today at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area. K-State will then host Oklahoma State at 9 a.m. Saturday. The matches will be moved indoors to the Cottonwood Racquet Club if the weather is bad.

Oklahoma, 9-3, defeated the Wildcats 9-0 n the fall campaign.

"Against OU we're going to try and get as many points as possible," Bietau said.

And the 'Cats were blanked 9-0 by Oklahoma State in the fall. The Cowgirls enter Saturday's match at 13-5.

"We're going to be as competitive as possible against O-State," Bietau said.

The starting of the Big Eight season is what K-State has been building toward since fall. Bietau is confident his team is ready to play after a long layoff.

"What we've pointed to all year is the Big Eight Conference matches," Bietau said.

'Cat rowers to host annual regatta

K-State's crew teams will host Washburn University in the Founder's Day Regatta Saturday at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Weather permitting, five races will be held at 30-minute intervals starting at 1 p.m. The races are held in honor of K-State and Washburn having the first two college crew teams in the state, Coach Don Rose said.

The races will be held on the east side of the reservoir, Rose said. Races will be run north to south, with the finish located just north of the dam.

Men's soccer squad to open season

The K-State men's soccer club opens the spring season Saturday when it takes on Oklahoma State in Stillwater. The team concludes a two-game road trip Sunday with a match against Oral Roberts in Tulsa.

"This will be a good tuneup for the Big Eight (Conference) Tournament next week," team president Ed Bennett said. "The weather has hampered our practices the last couple of weeks, but we feel confident of ourselves."

Three-pointer stays at present distance

By Staff and Wire Reports

The three-point shot will stay at its present distance of 19-feet-9 for at least another season of college basketball, and intentional fouls will be more expensive, the secretary of the NCAA Rules Committee announced Wednesday.

"The three-point rule did exactly what it was intended to do," said Ed Steitz, the committee secretary. It increased scoring, opened up the game and reduced rough play under the boards.

Despite howls of outrage prior to the rule's implementation for this past season, a late-season poll showed overwhelming support for retaining the three-point shot in some form, Steitz said.

Overall, he said, 1,448 coaches returned their questionnaires, and 80 percent favored keeping the three-point shot. Of those in favor, 35 percent wanted it kept at its current distance, and 36 percent favored moving it back 9 inches to the Olympic distance, he said.

K-State Coach Lon Kruger voted in favor of keeping the three-point shot and wanted it kept at its present distance.

Three changes were voted in for next season, Steitz said. The most obvious change involves intentional fouls.

"All intentional fouls will carry a two-shot penalty plus possession of the ball," he said. Currently, an intentional foul carries a two-shot penalty, but the offending team gains possession of the ball.

Kruger said the rule will cause a great amount of controversy.

"Especially in the area of determining what's intentional," Kruger said. "In a game situation a foul is obviously intentional because you fouled the guy to send him to the line, but it is seldom called."

He said there was some discussion about implementing a rule in effect 35 years ago that permitted a team to waive the foul shot and elect to retain possession by taking the ball out of bounds.

"That's something that's used in international rules and has its advantages and disadvantages," Kruger said.

He said a disadvantage would be teams would foul more if they knew the opposing squad would waive the foul shot. An advantage would be if a poor free-throw shooter was the person fouled.

Another change permits calling a technical foul on the coach if any of his players leave the bench to take part in a fight on the court.

The third change reduces the penalty for erroneously questioning a scoring or timing decision. Currently, a coach can be called for a technical foul if he questions a decision that is deemed correct. The change calls for charging his team with a timeout.

Other proposed changes that conferences may experiment with this year are:

— Making all substitutes report to the scorer from a box drawn directly in front of the scorer's table.

— Reducing jurisdiction of officials from 30 minutes to 20 minutes before tipoff.

Offensive line coach Mike Deal and running backs coach Mark Deal came to the K-State football program last year with Coach Stan Parrish from Marshall University. The brothers served as assistant coaches for Parrish for two seasons at Marshall before joining the Wildcats.

Oh, brother? No, it's coach

Assistant Coaches of K-State

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

It doesn't happen often that two brothers get to coach on the same staff at a major-college football program, but it's happening right now at K-State.

Mike and Mark Deal — both assistant coaches under head coach Stan Parrish at Wabash (Ind.) College, Marshall University and now at K-State — said it was a combination of coincidence and opportunism that brought them together in the first place.

"I started out at Wabash and was coaching there for about two years when a linebacker coaching job opened up. Mark at that time was a graduate assistant (linebacker) coach for Indiana University the year they went to the Holiday Bowl.

"Stan asked me if Mark was going to apply for the job and I said 'yes, I'm sure he will.' Then I told Coach Parrish not to hire him because of me and don't not hire him because of me," Mike said.

The younger Deal was hired and the two have coached under Parrish since.

As far as family relationships go, the Deal brothers agreed their family ties have no effect on the way they coach. They said if it did affect them, they wouldn't coach together.

"Mark's just a coach and I'm just a coach when we're in the office, and we're brothers when we're out of the office," Mike said. "If two brothers can handle it that way, then I don't think there is any problem with them coaching on the same staff.

"If it's not that way, it can be a problem," he added. "I think Stan found out during our three years at Wabash that being brothers had no bearing on our work ethic or working relationship within the same office."

Coaching seems to run in the Deal family. The two said it was their father who inspired both of them to become involved with football.

"Our dad was a high school coach where we grew up, so we were just both always into it. I went first, then we tried to talk Mark out of it," Mike said with a smile. "But basically, it's just a working relationship.

"We grew up eight years apart, which was far enough apart that we didn't have the same girlfriends and that kind of stuff," Mike said.

As far as their duties at K-State, they said the program needs improvement but is on the right track.

"We've got a long way to go, but I think we're going to get there," Mark said. "The players are very enthusiastic, they're working very hard. They have a goal in mind of what they want to do and their attitude is very good.

Mike said the team is working steadily toward its goal of winning more games and going to a bowl.

Troops to re-enact Civil War battles

By KARI COMPTON
Collegian Reporter

Imagine standing watch over a camp of Confederate troops on a cold, moonless night where every movement and sound in the brush could be Union soldiers positioning themselves for a raid.

This is likely to be a scenario this weekend for six K-State students and a Manhattan resident who left Thursday for Pea Ridge, Ark., to re-enact the Civil War battle fought there in 1862.

The group will assume the role of Confederate soldiers who fought a battle over a telegraph road. The participants are Greg Traxson, senior in history; Mike Welsh, junior in animal sciences and industry; Mark McCully, junior in engineering; Todd Dautel, junior in animal sciences and industry; Roger White, senior in agricultural education; Steve Black, senior in history; and Chip Houser, Manhattan resident.

The re-enactment of the Battle at Pea Ridge was designed for a history class at Coffeyville Community College, Traxon said. Traxson, who took the class two years ago and has been involved ever since, said this aspect of the course introduces students to what life as a Civil War soldier was like.

The students currently in the class will be recreating soldiers of Union forces, while Traxson and his group will be posing as the Confederate troops.

"We want everything as authentic as possible, including the clothes, food, tents and guns," he said. However, due to the lack of funds, only the guns are truly authentic.

"If someone wanted to be completely authentic, including outfit and guns, it could run $600 to $700," he said. "We (the K-State group) are sharing costs. We bought some old Army coats, and we're bleaching them gray and dying them a butternut color."

To achieve as much authenticity as possible, the people involved will be taking on characters of that time period.

The students in the class are required to make up a character with a name, age, place of birth and how the character came to be fighting in this battle. Traxson said the Confederate troops are encouraged to do the same thing. He said the more realistic the character is to that time period, the easier it will be to identify with what the Civil War soldier was thinking and feeling.

"Role playing will be stressed this weekend," he said. "I'd like conversations to be limited to things going on at that point in history.

"My biggest expectation is to introduce them to the situation as it was at that time. I want them to enjoy themselves and I want them to think of how rough it was to be a Civil War soldier. They were a different breed of men than we are today," Traxson said.

"When you're out on guard duty alone, that's when your mind starts playing tricks on you. You're out there by yourself, looking at trees for half an hour, and all of a sudden one gets up and moves on you. You know then your mind is playing with you, and that's when you know how the Civil War soldier felt."

Traxson said his group of Confederate soldiers will be carrying out raids on the Union camps, shoot-and-run attacks and chases.

"This year we have enough soldiers so we can fight in formal battle columns," Traxson said.

He said the Union troops will also have a five-horse cavalry, something new this year.

"We will be using blanks and powder as ammunition for the guns," he said.

Traxson said the two sides will call a truce on Saturday night and have the evening meal together to discuss the event and to get to know each other and their respective characters.

radioactive waste dump somewhere in the five states. The two companies are Westinghouse and U.S. Ecology. Westinghouse has not built any radioactive waste dump sites to date, but U.S. Ecology is currently battling two leaking sites — one in Sheffield, Ill. and the other in Maxey Flats, Ky.

Steve Boyda, a citizen appearing on behalf of Marshall County, at specific authorized times said senators at the hearing declared the opponents of the compact were overreacting and should not panic.

"The senators believe the public in western Kansas does not understand the issue and referred to them many times as being on the verge of panic," he said.

Boyda disagrees with the senators' assessment, saying that rural people apply different standards than just economic ones to a question of this magnitude.

"Kansans have a great deal of common horse sense and make decisions in terms of practical knowledge," Boyda said. "They realize they cannot depend on the technology to the extent that the experts are portraying that technology. They look at the evidence that shows three out of four sites built have failed and they see that it could just as easily happen here."

Opponents also have criticized a recent study by a consulting firm the compact hired, which was designed to help developers pick a site. Environmentalists have said the report shows an ignorance of local geology, and committee members agreed, voting unanimously Thursday to declare the report "faulty."

Before the meeting began, Sen. Meryl Werts, R-Junction City, said he was determined to have a orderly proceeding and told the crowd he expected it to remain quiet during committee discussion. Werts later angrily ejected a spectator for talking to the committee during debate, and also asked a woman to take her crying baby out of the room.

"There will be no interruptions from the gallery," Werts said.

Werts and other senators also told the crowd they were upset because of intense pressure put on them Wednesday by opponents of the compact. Werts and Gordon said their offices had been inundated with calls.

Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina, said he agreed the pressure had gotten out of hand, but cautioned Werts against criticizing the crowd for wanting to participate in the process.

Officials continue manhunt in central Missouri killings

By The Associated Press

DOOLITTLE, Mo. — Police officers manned road-blocks and used helicopters and dogs to search caves, buildings and wooded areas in east central Missouri for a suspected killer and expert in the art of hiding.

The suspect, John David Brown, 32, escaped in 1984 from the Ozark Correctional Center at Fordland while serving a burglary sentence. Police think he may have killed a church volunteer in Doolittle on Wednesday and shot a Rolla police officer Monday.

"He's very capable of concealment, very capable of getting through the woods and avoiding detection, and very capable of hiding," said Lt. Ernest McCutchen of the highway patrol.

McCutchen said Thursday that a man matching Brown's description, wearing camouflage-type clothing and apparently carrying a rifle, fled into the woods Wednesday evening when officers approached a car on Interstate 44 frontage road east of Doolittle.

"The officers were just approaching the car, when he jumped out and ran," McCutchen said. "They did not have time to take any type of action."

The car, parked in a ditch, belonged to Claude Curtis Long, 57, of Waynesville, a volunteer at the New Apostolic Church in Doolittle. Long had gone to the church to open it for evening services, and was later found shot to death in the building.

Police have been searching for Brown since Rolla Police Officer James Horn was shot and wounded early Monday as he and another officer were checking a report of a stolen vehicle outside a motel. Rolla is about five miles east of Doolittle, a community of about 700 about 125 miles southwest of St. Louis.

Brown was charged Monday in Phelps County Circuit Court with first degree assault in the attack on Horn, armed criminal action and receiving stolen property. The two Rolla officers found a car stolen from Osage Beach in 1985 parked outside the motel. Horn was reported in good condition Thursday at the Phelps County Regional Medical Center.

Residents in Brown's home town of Buffalo, north of Springfield, told police Brown was a skilled woodsman who loved to hide in the woods when he was growing up, McCutchen said.

Police cordoned off a two-square-mile area around Doolittle Wednesday after the man slipped away from them. After daybreak they began a more concerted search for the fugitive. Officers stopped all vehicles travelling through Doolittle Thursday, including school buses.

The search employed three helicopters and two dog teams.

Authorities urged area residents to lock their doors, take their keys from their cars and stay inside, according to Capt. Ralph Biele of the Missouri Highway Patrol.

"We feel he's in that particular area," Biele said. "He's already shot and killed one person. We don't want him to go in there and accost anybody else."

Police asked residents to call them if anyone they know failed to show up for work or if children did not come to school so they could check out any possibilities of people being taken hostage.

Fred Bell, who lives a mile away from the church and near a wooded area, said he and his wife were leaving Thursday afternoon and going to another residence nine miles west of Doolitte.

Pastor Carl Zerna of the New Apostolic Church described the murdered church member as " a big, old gentle guy who wouldn't hurt anybody."

"He had a heart of gold," Zerna said. "If that guy who shot him had just asked, he probably would have given him the keys. There was no foul play necessary."

Senators approve revisory committee

By MICHAEL MORRIS
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate approved the establishment of a Student Governing Association Constitutional and Bylaws Revision Commission Thursday evening.

Justin Sanders, graduate student in physics and sponsor of the bill, said the commission was necessary to revise any contradictory clauses in the constitution or bylaws.

Senate also approved a bill revising the SGA bylaws concerning the ratification of the SGA constitution by the college councils. The bill outlines a formal procedure for ratification since no procedure previously existed.

Senate also approved a special allocation of $81.17 to SGA to cover the remaining cost for the 1987-88 election.

In addition, Senate approved the appointment of Jennifer Leeds, sophomore in political science, as the new Associated Students of Kansas campus director. Leeds said ASK is currently involved with the release of fees issue.

"Currently, when students pay fees the state returns 50 percent back to the schools. We want to change that to 75 percent, which would generate approximately $322,000 for K-State," Leeds said.

Leeds also said ASK will be monitoring developments in the tuition bill which, if passed by the Kansas Legislature, would raise tuition 10-11 percent.

Senate also heard first reading of a bill to create a uniform student fee change policy. If the bill passes, additions and changes assessed to students' fees over which Senate has jursidiction will be discussed during one Senate meeting.

According to the bill, capital outlay fee proposals or fees decided by referendum would be exempt from the policy.

Senate decided to postpone voting on the bill until further evaluation and recommendations can be made by the Senate Operations Committee and the Student Affairs and Social Services Committee. Senate will vote on the bill April 16.

Also discussed by Senate was a bill revising the SGA bylaws concerning references made to the Kansas State Collegian. The bill states present clauses in the bylaws imply SGA has control over the Collegian's content.

In other action, Senate approved commendations to the men's and women's basketball teams.

Mike Kadel, junior in bakery science management, said the commendations were for the two teams' successful basketball seasons.

Also commended was the Washburn University men's basketball team for winning the National Association of Intercollegiate Athletics Basketball Championship Tournament.

Mike Goodwyn takes the spotlight as lead vocalist for Crosswind, a local rock band that has been playing since 1979. The ups and downs of the rock'n'roll business provide an interesting experience for Goodwyn and the four other band members. Sticking with a diminishing local band scene, they say, comes through good ol' hard work. See Page 4.

"Blue Velvet"

One of the most visually impressive movies released in 1986, but with a story so sordid — including rape, murder, torture, bondage, drug-addiction and kidnapping — that many people went running for the lobby long before the movie drew to a close.

New York critics loved it, though, and gave David Lynch the New York Film Critics Best Director award. The movie is a fascinating, if definitely unpleasant, exercise in style as Lynch takes us behind the white picket fences and neatly manicured lawns of small town America to reveal some lurid goings-on. Stars Lyle MacLachlan, Isabella Rossellini, Dennis Hopper and Laura Dern.

"The Name of the Rose"

Most American critics complained that the story was confusing, and maybe it is, but this movie is so filled with compelling images that it's well worth a look. Set in the 13th century, the film stars Sean Connery as a monk investigating a recent spree of murders at a monastery.

At the heart of the story is an issue of great importance in '80s America — the value of books. Should some books be declared evil simply because they contain ideas which we may not agree with?

"Tough Guys"

It's good to see Kirk Douglas and Burt Lancaster back at work again, but unfortunately the script for this movie is painfully thin. Douglas and Lancaster play two small time hoods released from prison for the first time after a quarter century. Needless to say, the world has changed.

Douglas was never very good playing good guys, and this film emphasizes his weakest tendencies. As a result, he hams it up in virtually every scene in the movie.

This isn't necessarily a bad movie, at times it's even fun watching these two actors kick up a fuss, but it misses out on the chance to say something important about what it's like growing old in America.

They aren't into Kiss-style make-up, they don't own a limousine and they'll never play Madonna. They are Crosswind, and they know how to rock 'n' roll.

This becomes obvious as shirtless drummer Dana Brown crashes into "Rock 'n' Roll," a Crosswind version of the classic Led Zepplin tune that always brings the crowd to its feet.

Members of Crosswind, one of few remaining local rock bands still performing in the area, can certainly say the band has had a past marked by numerous ups and downs. From its formation in 1979, Crosswind has gone through 15 band members and an equal number of sound technicians, as well as periods of uncertainty as to which musical route the band should take.

"When we first started out, we played everything from Alan Parsons to Charlie Daniels," said Tom Wiley, the only remaining original member.

"Then an agent told us we had to go one way or the other — either the rock side of it or the country side of it. We liked the rock side better, so we went with it and started playing hard rock and popular rock off of the radio."

Another agent told the band they had a distinct southern rock sound that should be capitalized on, so Crosswind made a gradual change to that type of music.

"There was only one other southern rock band in the area, whereas there were tons of Top-40 bands, so we went into southern rock and it fit us really well at the time," Wiley said.

Southern rock, as guitarist Jim Hedman defines it, is a mixture of rock and progressive country blues.

"Then it seemed like the southern rock thing kind of burned out and we started getting the reputation as a biker band."

hat type could possibly hurt he band's career, Crosswind lected to return to a more opular rock format and work on building a local following.

Wiley remembers several bars where the band became popular when it first started playing and the crowd turout was always good.

"We used to play at a place called The Machine in Ogden and at a place called The Brewery in Aggieville," Wiley said.

"The Brewery was what is now the back room of Ballard's and the front door opened onto the alley back there. The bar was maybe 12 feet wide and 50 feet long and we'd pack all our stuff in there and play."

It wasn't long before the band had received enough attention to do more out-of-town shows. They started working with agents, but found the band members themselves to be more in tune with what their audiences wanted than the agents were.

While the band was going through format changes, it was also changing members rapidly. This put stress on the band to adjust and still keep playing.

"What's so hard about changing members and getting new members in the band is it's easier to teach one person what everybody else already know than to have everybody learn a bunch of new music. It kind of stagnates us as far as learning new material when we're getting new members all the time," Wiley said

Recently, Crosswind has been able to settle down to its current lineup: Tom Wiley and Jim Hedman on guitar, Rick Pontalion on keyboards, Dana Brown on drums and Mike Goodwyn, junior in art, on lead vocals. Although the band is an important priority, all members maintain daytime jobs.

"Our main problem is getting a place to have everything and being able to work out everybody's schedules to where we can practice more than once or twice a week," Goodwyn said.

Add performing live to all of this and one wonders how Crosswind is able to maintain the level of performance they like to achieve. At a recent show at The Blue River Pub, Rt. 6, the band stirred the crowd with rock favorites "Takin' Care Of Business" originally by Bachman Turner Overdrive, and "Never Been Any Reason" originally by Head East — songs that capture the band's "kick back and party" mentality.

Changes in other bands don't hinder Crosswinds from staying with their traditional rock format, something the band finds easy to do with their commitment to their music and influences from bands such as Led Zepplin and Kansas.

Wiley is quick to point out, however, that each member's tastes and influences are different. The dedication to a hard working rock band is what pulls the members together.

Observing another band's performance recently, Wiley said the group made use of a little too much modern musical technology.

"They were 50 percent keyboards with nobody playing them," Wiley said. "Even some drums were prerecorded and they (the drums) were going before the drummer was even on the stage. They've got the bass line, keyboards and everything all pre-recorded and the guys sit up there and spaz out. I can appreciate it. The only reason I don't like it is because it's taking away jobs from good, hard-working musicians."

Film Review

'Blind Date' wins laughs with antics

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

After the complete disaster "A Fine Mess" and the box office bomb "That's Life," director Blake Edwards certainly needs his next movie to be a success. And if box office receipts are any clue, it looks as if Edwards found just the right material. His new film, "Blind Date," took in more than $7 million in its very first week.

The movie stars Bruce Willis of "Moonlighting" fame as a hard-working business executive named Walter Davis. It seems Walter has trouble developing lasting relationships with women, so when his boss tells him he must be present at a dinner party to help woo a new client, Walter must do some last-minute searching for a date.

His brother sets him up with Nadia (Kim Basinger), but he warns Walter to not let her drink any alcohol — "She goes wild." That doesn't sound bad to Walter. He wouldn't mind dating a beautiful women who totally loses her inhibitions.

The problem is once Nadia touches alcohol she doesn't simply get wild. Due to a chemical imbalance she turns into a one-woman wrecking crew and destroys everything in sight. She also has a psychotic ex-boyfriend, David, (John Larroquette, the lawyer with hyperactive hormones on "Night Court") who can't stand seeing her with another man. He's soon on Walter and his ex's trail.

Such plots are becoming common stuff. Martin Scorsese's "After Hours" and John Landis' "Into the Night" worked the same terrain just two years ago, but "Blind Date" is so filled with gags that it works anyway.

Many of the jokes fall flat, but because of the sheer non-stop barrage of pratfalls there's almost always something to laugh at. At times Edwards goes overboard. He has never seemed to know when enough is enough. And neither does he know anything about subtlety. His jokes are about as subtle as bricks upside the head, but they have a weird, sadistic charm at the same time, as was true in Edwards' Pink Panther movies.

"Blind Date" represents Bruce Willis' first attempt to break away from his TV image. Walter is much too uptight for the childish antics of David Addison (Willis' character on "Moonlighting"): He would never even dream of suddenly singing a '60s doo-wop classic in public. This isn't quite the role to establish Willis as a movie actor. He really doesn't have much to do except look confused while Nadia completely wrecks his life, not to mention his $20,000 Porsche.

Kim Basinger, the brunt of many a joke after "9½ Weeks," isn't half bad as Nadia, especially after she takes her first drink. Even in Nadia's sober moments, Basinger avoids the cloying that has ruined her past performances.

The only major weakness in "Blind Date" is the ending. Somehow we're supposed to believe after what Nadia did to Walter that he would fall in love with her. This is a completely arbitrary development that Edwards hasn't adequately set up.

The open interview session for Byron G. Walker will be at 10:30 a.m. today in Union 208. Students, faculty and administrators may attend the open interview session and ask questions of the finalist.

Walker has been facilities manager, facilities planning supervisor and construction management engineer for Solar Energy Research Institute in Golden, Colo., since 1980.

With water balloons in hurling position and goggles in place, members of the Haymaker/West bed cruise down Mid-Campus Drive Sunday during the Spring Fling Bed Race. The five teams competing in the annual race used a variety of food- and water-filled balloons to slow competitors on their way to the finish at the Pittman Building.

Bed race participants 'fling' more than sheets

By The Collegian Staff

Leaving a trail of Jell-O, oatmeal and flour across the campus, residence hall members, armed with food- and water-filled balloons, rolled five beds from the Union to Pittman Building Sunday in the bed-race competition on the final day of Spring Fling.

Spring Fling, sponsored by the Association of Residence Halls, is designated as a time for residence hall members to relax after spring break and before finals.

About 100 members competed in the bed race competition as participants unloaded a barrage of food products in the hopes of slowing down their competitors.

The Ford/Marlatt team lost a wheel during the race, and team members carried their bed across the finish line.

"We started out good, but then we lost the whole front end," said Dale Stegman, junior in engineering technology and member of the team, which still managed a fourth-place finish.

Goodnow Hall captured first place in the event.

Laurie Lawson, freshman in radio and television and team captain of the Ford/Marlatt team, said her team was equipped with balloons filled with chocolate syrup, vegatable oil, oatmeal, flour and white syrup. She also loaded a squirt gun with Tabasco sauce to fire at the other teams.

"It was a blast, a real good time," said Lawson, whose shirt, face and hair reeked of mustard, compliments of a member from another team in the bed races.

Lawson said the bed races were a good time "to meet people and get everyone (in the residence halls) together."

Saturday night, eight residence hall members donned their swimming trunks and took the plunge — into 760 gallons of strawberry Jell-O.

Participants' dives were judged on originality, crowd enthusiasm, costume apparel and donations pledged.

Bill Roberts, sophomore in electrical engineering and coordinator of the event, said about $225 was raised by the residence halls and diving members for the Red Cross Emergency Services.

Roberts said the three top-place finishers used unique approaches. The winner did an authentic belly-flop, and the second-place finisher dressed as a banana and peeled off the costume after jumping into the Jell-O. The third-place finisher, who weighed more than 300 pounds, created a Jell-O splash resembling "shrapnel," Roberts said.

"(The Jell-O dive) is looking pretty successful," Roberts said. "We're planning on doing it again next year."

What looked like a grade school play day, was really the Wacky Olympics staged on Goodnow Hall's front lawn Friday night.

Events included a wheelbarrow race, tug-of-war, Blind-Fold Piggy-Back Race, Catch the Wildcat's Tail competition, baseball-bat relay and four-legged race.

In the Catch the Wildcat's Tail competition, the team members joined in a line as other teams attempted to snatch the tail off the member on the end of the line.

The overall first-place team for the Wacky Olympics was the Ford/Goodnow team.

Open interviews for two of three finalists for General Manager of Physical Facilities have been scheduled this week.

The open interview session for Byron G. Walker will be at 10:30 a.m. today in Union 208. Students, faculty and administrators may attend the open interview session and ask questions of the finalist.

Walker has been facilities manager, facilities planning supervisor and construction management engineer for Solar Energy Research Institute in Golden, Colo., since 1980.

Walker has a professional degree in engineering geology from the Colorado School of Mines in Golden. He received his master's degree in civil engineering from the University of Missouri at Rolla and is a registered engineer, or licensed to practice in Colorado and Missouri.

'...we are giving the students, faculty and administration the opportunity to...be a part of the interview process.'

— George Miller

Kenneth Rott, another finalist, will be on campus Wednesday. His open interview session will be held at 9:45 a.m. in Union 207.

Rott has been director of physical facilities at Ball State University, Muncie, Ind., since 1976. He holds a master's degree in mechanical engineering from the University of Illinois at Urbana and a bachelor's in mechanical engineering from Valparaiso University in Valparaiso, Ind.

"This is a rather important position," said George Miller, vice president for administration and finance.

"Since this is such an important position, we are giving the students, faculty and administration the opportunity to ask the candidates questions and also be a part of the interview process," Miller said.

Dick Hayter, director of Cooperative Extension and search committee member, said the third candidate will be at K-State April 13. Name and information about the third candidate is not available at this time.

"We're going to be bringing in one or two others, but we're still in the process of conferring with candidates in terms of availability," Miller said.

Program studies academic barriers faced by black women

By DORI WITHERS
Collegian Reporter

Young black women are categorized in an academically high-risk group because of low self esteem and educational achievement barriers, said Anne Butler, director of educational supportive services.

Butler and Nancy Smith, associate professor of curriculum and instruction, are studying successful strategies for improving the academic performance and persistence rate of black females in kindergarten through high school. The U.S. Women's Educational Equity Act program is funding the one-year project.

Butler said black females have been virtually ignored by researchers.

"It is almost an invisible child," Butler said. Most studies are concerned with either race without specifying gender or gender without specifying race.

"The assumption is whatever applies to white girls also applies to black girls," Butler said. "This is not the case."

Young black females need to know the histories of successful black women to counteract the negative stereotypes of this group, she said.

A distinct relationship has been found between the amount of student-teacher interaction and academic performance. Results from teachers observed in the classroom indicated the stratification of classroom attention, with teachers directing the greatest amount to white males, followed in order by white females, black males and black females.

A 1981 U.S. Census Bureau report indicates the drop-out rate for black females was higher than for black males and white males and females, Butler said.

More than 45 percent of black females do not graduate from high school, she said. One reason is a high pregnancy rate, which forces them to quit school and raise a family, she said.

Butler said 70 percent of black families are headed by females. The study also recognizes the median income for black women heading families is half the median income of white female family heads.

With this staggering difference, Butler points out the need for strategies to help young black females continue their education in spite of family commitments and poverty.

Butler said there is a communication gap between researchers, educators and practitioners. Through the project, Butler and Smith hope to fill in this gap by educating teachers, who are in a prime position to intervene and help black females.

"Drastic intervention needs to take place to educate and offer more options because of the roles (black females) are going to assume," she said.

In conjunction with the Kansas Department of Education's conference on "Students at Risk — Who They Are, How They Can Be Helped," the project will hold a two-day institute on campus ending today.

Six vie for city commission

By The Collegian Staff

Three candidates will take their seats on the Manhattan City Commission when Tuesday's general election comes to an end.

Voters may cast their ballots Tuesday from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m.

The six candidates who survived the March primary and have been campaigning for the three city commission positions are: Nancy Denning, Kent Glasscock, Richard Hayter, Roger Maughmer, Bob Newsome and Ruth Schrum.

Denning, president of Denning, Buster and Hungate marketing agency, said many issues face the commission in the future and she supports several of them.

"I'm certainly for downtown, but I'm for the continued improvement of other business districts in Manhattan as well," Denning said.

"Funding is one of the most critical issues we face — it's the biggest issue there is," Denning said. "Everybody wants a piece of the pie, but there is not enough of the pie to go around.

"The commission is going to be faced with prioritizing its wants and needs," she said. "How can (the state legislators) have a mandate and say (cities) need something and not provide adequate means for funding."

Kent Glasscock, president of Home Lumber Co., said he believes in the future of Manhattan.

"The Town Center is going to be a critical element for the future of our community," Glasscock said.

"The city needs to get projects that come in on budget time and are done with strong sensitivity to the quality part of the project," he said. "I don't see, in the immediate future, anything that leads me to believe the city won't meet its financial obligations."

Glasscock said he is running for a commission seat because of his dedication to Manhattan.

"The bottom line is a strong commitment to the community," he said. "I believe in Manhattan and its future. I'm willing to take

Nine seek school board slots

By The Collegian Staff

Voters will go to the polls Tuesday to elect a new USD 383 Board of Education.

Seven candidates are vying to fill four four-year terms and two are seeking a two-year term on the five-member board.

Polls to elect the school board and city commission will open at 7 a.m. and close at 7 p.m.

Four-year candidates include Shirley Bramhall, Joleen Hill, Jim Lindquist, Mary Nichols, Flordie Pettis, Robert Shoop and Barbara Withee. Rudy Clarenburg and Beverly Eversmeyer are seeking the single two-year term.

Shirley Bramhall, a Manhattan resident seeking a four-year term, said it is important for the board to set priorities.

"I think we need to put our priorities in order," Bramhall said. "I think No. 1, we need to reward our career teachers; I think that we need to put our reading program right behind that."

Bramhall said she would like to see the board implement a study habit program "that would teach the children study skills, organizational skills and time management.

"The reason I would like to see this happen is a lot of the children who leave the elementary schools, which I have one doing this next year, leave the elementary schools really successful, but when they get up to the middle schools, they're overwhelmed by all the added responsibilities that they have and the newness of the school," she said.

Bramhall said one reason she is running for the board is to provide better communication between the board and the public.

"I tried to get answers to some questions about reading programs and teachers, and I arrived at my answers with great difficulty, and it was due to communication," she said. "I don't know whether I wasn't knocking on the right doors or calling the right people."

Factions agree to truce in Lebanon

BEIRUT, Lebanon — Shiite Moslems and Palestinians on Sunday agreed to a Syrian-sponsored truce in the nearly 2-year-old fight for control of Palestinian refugee camps in Beirut and southern Lebanon.

The cease-fire was to go into effect at 8 a.m. today, the warring factions said in a joint statement.

The Shiite Amal militia also agreed to end its nearly 5-month-old blockade of two Palestinian refugee camps in Moslem west Beirut, the statement said.

It was issued after a meeting between the two sides under the auspices of Brig. Gen. Ghazi Kenann, Syria's chief of military intelligence in Lebanon.

Three students injured in protest

JERUSALEM — Police used clubs and a water cannon Sunday to disperse about 1,500 students protesting tuition increases in a violent demonstration. Three people were injured.

Police spokesman Rafi Levy said 17 students were arrested, questioned and then released.

In the predominantly Arab sector of East Jerusalem, dozens of Palestinian women hurled stones at passing vehicles and at least one person was injured, Levy said.

He said the women were demonstrating against the treatment of Palestinian inmates in Israeli jails and that five women and two men were arrested.

The student protest began outside Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's office as youths chanted slogans against a government plan to increase annual tuition fees from $900 to $2,000.

Interstate bridge collapses in N.Y.

AMSTERDAM, N.Y. — An interstate highway bridge over a rain-swollen creek collapsed Sunday, sending at least three cars and a tractor-trailer plunging about 80 feet into swirling, muddy water.

It was not immediately known how many people might have been killed or hurt when the four-lane span on the New York State Thruway collapsed shortly before 11 a.m., said state police Troop T Commander Edward Vanderwall.

More than 50 rescue workers rushed to the scene, but could not reach the vehicles because of the "boiling water" of the Schoharie Creek, said Thruway Authority spokesman Arthur D'Isabel.

"There is no possibility of rescue," said Vanderwall, whose unit patrols the Thruway, part of Interstate 90. "We still are not sure who or what is in there...The water is just too high, too fast and too dirty."

Man attempts suicide in prison

TOPEKA — A 19-year-old man charged with killing a restaurant employee was treated at a hospital after attempting suicide by cutting his wrists with a razor, authorities said.

Bradley R. Smith of Topeka was showering Saturday evening at the Shawnee County Jail when he cut his wrists with a razor, jail officials said.

Corrections specialist Jill Tipton said prisoners may request a razor to shave while in the shower. Smith, who was in an isolation cell, was alone in the shower, she said.

A guard discovered Smith and summoned a nurse, who treated his wounds. He was taken by ambulance to Stormont-Vail Regional Medical Center and was returned to the jail after further treatment.

Smith was charged with first-degree murder in the slaying and attempted robbery of Larry J. Parker, 27, an assistant manager at a Hardee's restaurant in Topeka. Parker was fatally shot Nov. 16 outside a bank after leaving the restaurant to make a night deposit.

Smith was scheduled to appear in court Wednesday for the conclusion of a hearing to determine whether he can withdraw his no contest plea to the murder charge.

Cookies help couple survive storm

NORTON — A couple trapped in their car for 13 days by roof-high snowdrifts from two blizzards said Sunday they survived with the help of two boxes of Girl Scout cookies, blankets, arguments, a copy of Good Housekeeping and prayer.

"Along the last, it got pretty scary," said 65-year-old Nellie Obendorf. "We thought, 'oh, they're never coming.' Then a tractor came over the hill and I started to yell."

Nellie, 65, and her husband Orville, 70, of Nampa, Idaho, were in satisfactory condition Sunday at Norton County Hospital, where they were taken Saturday.

Farmer Gayle Schultz found the couple in their car about six miles west of Norton in western Kansas at about 9 a.m. Saturday when he went to clear a road for the mailman.

"We're feeling just fine. We're just real thankful that the Lord saved us," Nellie said in a telephone interview from the hospital. "I think I went through the whole Book."

The retired farm couple had been driving to visit her sister in Iola when they wandered off a main road. They had a supply of blankets, but the only food in the car was two boxes of Girl Scout cookies — peanut butter and mint — purchased outside an auto parts store in Idaho.

"We rationed 'em," she said. "One cookie a day. We were down to the last cookie."

The white top of their car made it invisible to Kansas National Guard aircraft that circled overhead, dropping hay to stranded cattle in the area.

Students face burglary charges

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

Two K-State students are scheduled to appear April 8 in Riley County District Court on charges of burglary, resisting arrest and assault on a police officer.

Jeffrey L. Holly, freshman in business administration, and Arnie Bazemore, freshman in arts and sciences, were arrested March 13 for attempted burglary of a car in parking lot B-3, north of Weber Hall.

K-State investigator Richard Herrman and two other officers were staking out the parking lot when they observed two individuals enter the lot and look into several cars. The individuals then approached a Pontiac Firebird car, pulled out the window and unlocked the door.

"We slipped up on them, identified ourselves as police officers and charged them," Herrman said.

Holly and Bazemore were taken to the Riley County Jail that night, and they were released on $1,000 bond, said Capt. Larry Woodyard of the Riley County Police Department.

Charges of burglary, resisting arrest and assault on a police officer were brought against Holly in the first court appearance on March 18. Bazemore was charged with burglary and resisting arrest. Both pleaded not guilty.

The preliminary hearing scheduled for April 8 will determine whether there will be a formal trial, at which penalties will be decided, Woodyard said.

Charles Beckom, superintendent of the K-State Police, said the county courts sometimes refer cases involving minor crimes committed by University students back to the judicial system on campus.

This is only done, however, when the courts believe the social nature of the crime would be better handled by the University in order to set an example for the other students, Beckom said.

The University will not consider any disciplinary action until after the preliminary hearing.

Benefits numerous

Focus: preventative exercise

By The Collegian Staff

One out of every two people dies of heart disease, which could be prevented through exercise, said Mari Hopper, instructor in the Department of Physical Education, Dance and Leisure Studies during the Friday Focus on Women.

Exercise may help prevent or alleviate the symptoms of physiological disorders such as cardiovascular disease, osteoporosis, diabetes and hypertension. Psychological disorders such as depression and anxiety may also be helped by exercise, she said.

In her topic of discussion "Exercise as a Prophylactic," Hopper defined prophylactic as disease preventing.

Smoking, heredity, stress, high blood pressure and physical inactivity are some risk factors of cardiovascular disease, she said.

Some of the factors such as stress and hypertension can be controlled by exercise, Hopper said.

Studies have shown that after one exercise session, muscle tension and anxiety can be lessened, she said.

Exercise can also reduce mild cases of hypertension and the medication needed to control it, Hopper said.

Osteoporosis, abnormal demineralization of the bone, may be prevented by exercise, she said. Adding weight can strengthen bones, resulting in higher bone mineral content.

Athletes usually have higher bone mineral content than people confined to bed rest, Hopper said.

Exercise prescribed for someone with adult-onset diabetes may include cycling, walking and swimming, she said. Many with adult-onset diabetes are overweight and have hypertension. Benefits of exercise include weight control and controlled hypertension.

"As a general rule, it is important to consult with a doctor before beginning a vigorous exercise program, especially if a known disease state exists," Hopper said.

Depression can be a disease condition if it continues day after day, she said. Studies show there is a decrease in depression when exercise is introduced.

Disabled clients sell plants, handmade products

By LAUREN BRUNO
Collegian Reporter

Plants and woodcrafts sold Friday to raise money to benefit Big Lakes Development Center programs were grown or made by the developmentally disabled men and women at the center.

The Big Lakes Development Center, 1500 Hayes Drive, serves about 100 developmentally disabled men and women from Riley, Geary, Clay and Pottawatomie counties, said Janice Pankratz, community relations coordinator.

Plants sold included hanging plants and bedding plants. Candleholders, knife blocks, doll cradles and bird feeders were also sold. About $210 was raised at the sale, she said.

The plants are grown at a K-State greenhouse used by Big Lakes' clients, and the woodcrafts are made at the BLDC in Manhattan.

Other fund-raisers include plant sales in cooperation with University For Man and Big Lakes' Festival of Trees.

"The Festival of Trees is our biggest fund-raising event," Pankratz said.

The Festival of Trees is a three-day event involving the viewing and sale of donated, decorated Christmas trees. A small fee is charged for public viewing, and after three days, the trees are auctioned at a private showing.

"Twenty-five individuals and businesses participated last year, and we raised more than $7,000," Pankratz said.

BLDC is a private, non-profit community-based agency supported by county, state and federal funding, donations and fund-raising, she said.

Clients in the Big Lakes programs are trained in different skills so they can be placed in competitive employment. Woodcrafting, assembly line techniques and computer training are some skills taught at BLDC.

The clients are paid for their work, which is contracted by Big Lakes from about 50 businesses and manufacturers, Pankratz said.

Infant development, early childhood development and adult vocational training are the three programs offered at BLDC.

Before entering the Big Lakes programs, clients are given psychological and vocational evaluations by Dennis Hemmendinger, staff psychologist. These evaluations determine which training level and living arrangements the clients should be placed in.

Hemmendinger is also available for the clients on an individual counseling basis.

According to their ability, clients are placed in programs requiring different levels of difficulty.

Clients in the most basic level learn to sort papers and stuff envelopes, and those in the highest level work with heavy machinery cutting lumber materials.

Big Lakes also offers three types of living arrangements for their adult clients. BLDC does not provide the housing but will find housing for each individual in an arrangement best suited for his or her needs, Pankratz said.

The group living situation is offered to the developmentally disabled who are totally dependent and need constant supervision.

Duplex living is available for less dependent clients. This living situation allows clients to live semi-independently with a supervisor available if needed.

Apartment living is available for clients able to function independently without supervision.

Promotion of University starts at home

PATRICK MUIR
Collegian Columnist

Before I start this week, I would like to apologize for skipping this column last week. The therapy sessions that some of your letters to the editor have necessitated have been taking too much time.

To those who didn't notice and usually skip my columns, I understand. It must take an incredible amount of time to help Gary Hart pay off his 1984 campaign debt and other such noble enterprises.

But back to business. Just before spring break you might recall certain hostile remarks that I expressed concerning the University of Kansas — you know, the one in Lawrence. Several of you were entertained but expressed concern that I was inferring that Kansas State University can't be billed on its own merits. I apologize to those who perceived such a message. It couldn't be further from the truth. There are many potential recruitment-oriented features of K-State.

Several of them we are too familiar with to remember that they are outstanding and invaluable assets. The obvious example is the Union. On its own merits, it is a wonderful feature. But when compared with similar buildings in the country, it is outstanding, as validated by a New York Times survey which placed it in the top 10 in the country.

We need to spotlight this building more than we do in our recruitment publications. A case in point is the new University Bulletin publication, a wonderful artistic achievement that brags about the Union. But there is not one picture that captures the feeling of the Union during a rush hour. We can easily improve here.

Another example is Durland Hall. This building was selected by the Kansas Society of Architects as one of the outstanding buildings in the state. But what do we feature in Open House advertisements across the state? Balloons. Yes, that's right — K-State is the kind of place where people are driven to blow balloons in the name of recruitment. I can understand that Open House weather traditionally makes balloons an obvious complement, but it does nothing for someone who has never seen the campus. Are we recruiting our little brothers and sisters or the MTV generation that is impressed with architecture and culture?

Another facility is the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. I never saw it until I arrived officially at K-State. There are racquet clubs with lesser facilities charging more than our tuition for membership. This is another feature that is slighted.

But all these are purely physical and only complement our education. Our tradition of educational excellence is reflected in the number of awards and distinctions our students receive annually. These kind of awards reflect on the teacher quality that exists at this university. You don't just happen to stumble upon seven Truman scholars in the last five years. Only Harvard, Yale and K-State have had two selected in consecutive years. On a cost basis, I think K-State may be ahead.

One of the most impressive recognitions must be those given to the Department of Landscape Architecture. The American Society of Landscape Architects recognizes six top students across the country each year. In 1985, K-State received half of these, the most allowed by any school. At least one student has been honored the last nine years.

There are many fine departments with outstanding ratings that are simply not featured enough. The Department of Accounting was ranked No. 13 in the nation by a survey of the 25 largest CPA firms. Another similar achievement went to the Department of Journalism and Mass Communications when it was ranked No. 18 in the country — the highest ranking of any journalism program in the state — by a publication of the National Education Standards. We just don't know enough about these kind of distinctions.

These are just a few examples but unless you are giving University tours you don't hear much about them. Instead, on promotional spots during televised basketball games, we see a horse on a treadmill. Talk about perpetuating stereotypes of Silo Tech.

Speaking of Silo Tech and the dominant image of K-State being a rural agriculture school, how many people on this campus are aware that more than half the students in the College of Agriculture are from urban areas? Agriculture isn't purely rural anymore and neither is K-State. But not enough people know it. Yet how are they supposed to when they see horses running on treadmills at K-State?

In thinking about what K-State has to offer, too many of us do not place our accomplishments in terms of the history of this institution. K-State was only officially distinguished as a "university" on March 27, 1959. This is recent history and we should not for a minute feel inferior to a particular neighbor to the east considering our accomplishments lately. K-State is still growing as an institution and I think this is one of the most promising and rewarding things about an affiliation with K-State.

We should think of ourselves like the students who financed the Union. Many of those students would never use that building as a student but they had a commitment to this place. I am sure that when they come back to visit us today they are thrilled with our growth. Sure we are building a new coliseum but what about the little things that show enthusiasm? How many of us don't have K-State bumper stickers on our cars? When was the last time you bought a K-State gift for a friend or relative? These kind of things help spread our name and reputation across the state. We must remember that we are only getting better and we can make a difference.

This is the kind of spirit and motivation that should be visible in our recruiting efforts, not balloons. I know I am proud of this place and not the only one who receives fulfillment from watching this university grow. We can make a difference and we will if we realize our potential. The excitement is really building.

Despite Werts' belief, disposal fears are real

Remarks made by several senators of the Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee at a public hearing last Friday should raise the ire of Kansans all over the state.

At the hearing, our own local Sen. Meryl Werts, R-Junction City, loudly chastised those members of the public present for calling him and other representatives to talk about the waste compact issue.

Werts and other senators told the crowd "they were upset because of the intense pressure put on them Wednesday by opponents of the compact" and that their offices had been "inundated" with calls.

It is apparent from these remarks and others the senators made that they are not dedicated to representing the interests of Kansans. They are interested only in achieving the goals they have decided among themselves to be worthy projects. They are certainly not interested in what their constituents have to say.

It also becomes obvious that our current senators are not made of the same mettle as they used to be. In the 1890s, when the Populists were prominent in Kansas, debate over issues in the legislature included aspects other than just economics. It seems our senators know of no other issues besides money.

Then, elected officials knew their job was to represent the residents of Kansas and they did...or they did not remain representatives very long.

In other comments by the senators, it becomes obvious they think they are representing IGNORANT Kansans. They have suddenly concluded that Kansans who live close to probable sites for the waste disposal facility are panicking over nothing.

The truth is rural residents live in close commune with the land and they apply common sense standards to a problem which could definitely destroy the livelihood of this region — both environmentally and genetically.

Oral Roberts' charade must be stopped now

Oral Roberts knows a good thing when he sees it.

He told his followers last week that God had spared his life because the evangelist raised more than $8 million. As followers of this spectacle will recall, God had supposedly earlier offered the ultimatum to Roberts to raise the funds by the end of March or be "called home."

The Lord extended his life but warned Roberts that $8 million must be raised every year until the second coming of Christ.

The money, Roberts said, would turn the Oral Roberts University medical school around, funding scholarships for students to become medical missionaries in Third World countries.

Roberts has cut himself quite a deal, using God as a lever to pry more funding out of the pocketbooks of believers. His lure is a person's devotion to God and the church, and the evangelist is reeling in his catch hook, line and sinker.

By taking advantage of faith in religion, Roberts is corrupting the church and misusing his power. He has pushed the public's belief in his cause to the outermost limits and must not be allowed to continue the charade of "raising money for God."

Followers should heed a new warning: Beware the wolf in sheep's clothing.

Just your 'average Joe'

Senators not unreachable nerds

CHARLENE NICHOLS
Guest Columnist

There seems to be a huge myth floating around our fair campus. It appears many of you think student government is for a few snobby, elitist greeks. Or, perhaps, as one person recently told me, "They're a bunch of smart nerds that are interested in politics."

As the recently appointed Senate Communications Committee chairwoman, it is my mission to dispel and put to rest forever these senseless rumors. To begin with, I think I'll tackle the old "you've got to know someone to get into student government" theory.

I first got involved in Senate a year ago. After 1½ years of total apathy, I decided it was time for me to do something. A friend saw an ad in the Collegian for Senate interns and suggested that I apply. My reaction? I said, "Yeah, right. I'm sure I'm student government material." I applied anyway.

A couple of weeks later, I attended my first Senate meeting. To be incredibly honest, I was scared to death. I was sure that the Big Eight Room would be full of snobs who regularly spoke so eloquently that only Daniel Webster could fully understand them. Boy, was I wrong.

If you'd like to see an example of diversity among students, drop by a Senate meeting. The far sides of the Big Eight Room are referred to as the Kennedy and Buckley sections. People who sit in the middle are, obviously, moderates.

The Kennedy side of the room features Kirk Caraway. Those of you who frequent the editorial page are familiar with Kirk's left-field, anti-apple pie and conservative America literary meanderings. What you see in the Collegian is the real Kirk Caraway. If that's not a scary thought, I'm not sure what is.

The Buckley side's main attraction is another of everyone's favorite columnists. Patrick Muir, the alien from the land of Rick Springfield, Air Supply and crocodile wrestling, is Senate's unofficial junior David Letterman. His quips about President Jon Wefald's frequent use of "really" and K-State's abundance of purple trash cans keep Senate somewhat amused.

I guess I could use myself as an example of a moderate, even though I'm not a senator. Sometimes, I agree with the liberals. Sometimes, I agree with the conservatives. Always, I get picked on by both sides. There's a good reason, though. I'm forever saying stupid things that get me in trouble and my name on the quote board. My latest slip? "I learned about it (sex) on the streets."

By this time, you're probably wondering what the point of these endless ramblings could be. I'm trying to let you know that those of us already involved in student government are a bunch of average Joe college students.

We took on the extra responsibilities and demands that student government places upon us because we feel we can make a difference. We want to serve you, the students, in any and all ways we can.

There is a catch, though. To really represent you, we've got to know how you feel about the issues. If you hear of something that disturbs you, or if you have any ideas of ways we can better the University community, it is your responsibility to inform us.

Apathy is the greatest problem K-State student government faces. I know that many of you care about tuition, fee increases, Senate representation and the quality of our education. Please, let us know how you feel. Read in the Collegian what's coming up on the Senate floor. If you're confused or have questions, stop by the Student Government Services Office or give us a call.

If you'd like to inform Senate of your views, come to a meeting. At the beginning of all meetings, Chairwoman Michelle Benoit asks if any non-senators would like to address Senate on any issue. This part of the meeting, called open period, is not utilized as it should be. The opportunity is there. Take advantage of it.

A senator can be reached Monday through Friday from 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. is the SGS office located on the ground floor of the Union by the bank teller machines. If you don't want to walk that far, call us. Our phone number is 532-7777.

Remember, we can only represent you if we know your views on the issues.

Charlene Nichols is a junior in journalism and mass communications.

FFS package reigns as judge of financial aid

Editor's Note: Today begins the first of a five-day series on student financial aid. Tomorrow will feature an in-depth look at student matching services.

By DERON JOHNSON
Editorial Page Editor

Among financial aid application packages, the Family Financial Statement reigns king. Or at least first runner-up.

The application package, provided by the American College Testing Program, is one of two national forms used most frequently, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance. The FFS, used by K-State, and the Financial Aid Form, provided by the College Scholarship Service, are the two forms most utilized in the United States.

Probably 95-98 percent of students attending universities use either the FFS or FAF, said Christine Crenshaw, associate director of student financial assistance. She said all Kansas universities use the FFS.

"The whole state system is designed around the FFS form," Crenshaw said.

However, the FFS and FAF are just two of up to 18 national needs analysis forms that have gained approval from the Department of Education, which has a form of its own as well. The Department of Education offers the Application for Student Aid, also referred to as the federal form. Viterna said there are 14-18 forms currently in use in the United States.

With all the forms available, including some specific state forms such as the one used by Illinois, how does an institution decide what form is best? What if, as Crenshaw said, "The students will get the same results no matter which ones they fill out?"

Viterna said the FFS stands out for a number of reasons.

"They have a very good record of being accurate in their forms," he said. This is due largely to the form's use of ovals, which Viterna said enhances not only accuracy but speed as well. That speed allows ACT to send the results of the FFS by teletransmission to financial aid offices within two weeks of receiving the form.

The fact that ACT sends the form to financial aid offices at all is an added advantage, Viterna said. Often, the form is sent to the student, who then must deliver it to the particular financial aid office. This process ends up taking more time than ACT's, which essentially avoids the "middle man."

"That is a benefit to the student," Viterna said. "We immediately know the student is applying for financial aid."

ACT sends the Comprehensive Financial Aid Report to college offices and the Student Financial Aid Report to students. If students wish, they may obtain a copy of the report sent to the aid offices.

Viterna said all national aid application forms use uniform methodology, a formula that determines the amount of money expected to be contributed by a student and his/her parents. This, in turn, determines a student's need.

In determining the expected family contribution, Viterna said, the uniform methodology formula considers such variables as adjusted gross income, number of members in the family, ages of the parents, debt, assets and medical expenses.

Crenshaw said the formula has been used ever since there has been a national program for awarding financial assistance. Uniform methodology evolved from other formulas and is reviewed every year, she said. The review is designed to update the methodology to reflect the annual economy.

However, beginning with the 1988-89 academic year, national application forms will rely on Congressional methodology, Viterna said. This change is one of several regarding financial aid incorporated into the Reauthorization of the Higher Education Act of 1965, passed by Congress on Oct. 17, 1986.

Crenshaw said it's unclear exactly why Congress adopted the Congressional methodology. That will become clear later, she said.

"The rationale behind it has not been delved into," she said. "Whether it'll experience changes in amendments is anybody's guess. It's just too new."

Viterna said there is one essential change from uniform methodology to Congressional methodology.

"In some respects, (Congressional methodology) treats independent students with higher income and more assets more favorably than the uniform methodology does," he said. However, the form does not affect the status of dependent students.

Crenshaw said independent students would not be expected to contribute as much to their education as they are now. She said the revamped formula will determine exactly what they will be expected to pay.

Major changes affect loans

By JEFF BIELSER
Staff Writer

New definitions for independent student status weren't the only significant changes made during the last reauthorization of federal financial aid programs. The Guaranteed Student Loan Program also experienced drastic changes.

In addition to requiring all applicants for GSLs or National Direct Student Loans to fill out the Family Financial Statement package, the new rules also changed the way GSLs are calculated, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

"Under the new regulations, as a result of reauthorization, a student has to show financial need in order to get a Guaranteed Student Loan," he said.

According to a pamphlet provided by Viterna's office, the method for determining financial need will be identical to that method used for other federal financial aid programs, such as the Supplemental Education Opportunity Grant program.

With the new rules, the students' needs will be determined by information entered on the FFS, he said.

As an example, Viterna said, a dependent student would have to fill out the form showing assets for both the student and the parents.

"The Family Financial Statement is going to ask for things like how many people there are in the family; how many are going to be in college next year; the age of the older parent; the adjusted gross income of that family for the past year; and what the family's net assets are," he said.

"Taking all that information, plugging it into a formula, the results are the expected family contribution, the amount that this family...should have available for that student to go to college next year," he said.

The changes mean both the NDSL and GSL loans will be calculated the same, he said.

Other changes in the GSL and NDSL programs include increasing the limits for GSLs and the grace period of NDSLs, Viterna said.

The limit for the first two years of undergraduate study has been raised to $2,625, and for the years after that the limit is now $4,000 per year.

Graduate students can now borrow a maximum of $7,500 per year.

This means undergraduate students can borrow a total aggregate amount of $17,250, and $54,750 for both graduate and undergraduate study, Viterna said.

The biggest change in the NDSL rules increases the grace period from six months to nine months, he said. The grace period is the amount of time a student has after leaving school before the loan repayment starts.

Veterans to use new GI Bill

By JEFF BIELSER
Staff Writer

Veterans are attending universities with the aid of a variety of educational assistance programs.

The newest of the GI Bills is Chapter 30, said Lorene Dahm, administrative officer I. It is for veterans who entered the armed forces after July 1, 1985.

This means veterans will start arriving at K-State this fall who can take advantage of the benefits provided by Chapter 30, she said.

Veterans are already attending school under the old GI Bill and the Veterans Educational Assistance Program, or Chapter 32, Dahm said.

The old GI Bill is for veterans who entered the armed forces before Jan. 1, 1977. Those enlisting between Jan. 1, 1977, and July 1, 1985, are attending with benefits from Chapter 32.

"The Army says participation (in Chapter 30) is 80 percent to 82 percent," Dahm said. The Army "anticipates growing increase in students coming to educational institutions."

In 1987, the Army anticipates 800 veterans will attend school under Chapter 30, with the number increasing to 20,000, she said. By 1992 the number of veterans will swell to 180,000.

"The Army is very pleased with the quality of the enlistee and the quality of the student as well," Dahm said.

Chapter 30 contains some provisions that make it different from the old GI Bill and Chapter 32, she said.

For example, the new GI Bill will not pay for remedial courses or retakes, Dahm said. This means classes beginning with zero on the line schedule will not be paid for.

There is also a limit to Uncle Sam's generosity.

Veterans will receive benefits for 36 months under Chapter 30, Dahm said. This is in contrast to 45 months under the old GI Bill.

Checks are made of veterans' academic progress, because it is "up to the school to make sure they are on their degree track," Dahm said.

Along with the new GI Bill has come some complications, she said.

Among those might be that veterans will have to send a card to the Veterans Administration certifying they are still in school, Dahm said.

No matter what program veterans or their dependents may be attending K-State with, certification is the key.

"The main concern is the lag time between the time the application is processed (at K-State) and the time money is received (by the veteran)," Dahm said.

She said she "encourages veterans who pre-enroll for the next term to get certification in."

Red tape increases for 'independent' students

By JEFF BIELSER
Staff Writer

A financial aid packet twice the size of the one used last year awaited students filling out their Family Financial Statements for the 1987-88 school year.

The reason for the increase in size was mainly due to the changes in the definition of who can be considered an independent student, said Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance.

"Part of that reason is because of the change in the student definition, it takes more room to find out whether a student is independent," Viterna said.

Under the new law a student must meet only one of several definitions to be considered an independent student, he said.

Students are independent if they are 24 or older by Dec. 31 of the award year, Viterna said. For this year, students must have been 24 or older by Dec. 31, 1986, to be considered independent.

Orphans, wards of the court, veterans of the armed forces or students with legal dependents other than spouses are considered independent under the new rules, he said.

Graduate students, professional students or married students not claimed as dependents on their parents' income tax returns for the first calender year of the award year are independent, Viterna said. In this case, parents cannot have claimed the students on their 1986 tax return.

Single undergraduate students with more than $4,000 in annual income who do not have dependents and are not claimed as dependents on their parents' or guardians' income tax return are also considered independent.

According to the new law, students must demonstrate self-sufficiency during the two calender years preceding the award year with the $4,000 annual income. Financial aid monies received cannot be counted as part of the total annual income.

A scientific study conducted by American College Testing showed 18 percent of students currently one status or another will change as a result of the new law, Viterna said.

Our Constitution was born out of a cacophony of competing voices.

But today the freedom of speech that remains the hallmark of our Constitution may be threatened.

The NAAAF Essay Contest is designed to emphasize the importance of free speech and open debate in a vital area.

In his best-selling book, They Dare to Speak Out: People and Institutions Confront Israel's Lobby, former Congressman Paul Findley sounds an alarm: "It is clear that many Americans do not feel they can speak freely on one of the most complicated and challenging current issues: The Arab-Israeli dispute."

Is he right? What do you think?

1787 Signing of the Constitution, George Washington Presiding, by Howard Chandler Christy

Full time college and university students are invited to submit a critical essay of 2,500 words or less on the subject "The Development of American Middle East Policy: Is Free Speech Threatened?"

There will be 200 regional winners of $1,000 each and 10 national winners of an additional $4,000 each.

The contest is sponsored by the NAAA Foundation, a charitable organization which carries out educational programs on Middle East subjects.

Children discuss TV attitudes with media class

By SANDRA SIEBERT
Collegian Reporter

A "panel of experts" — six children ranging from 4 to 15 years old — discussed how they view the media Friday morning with students in Psychology of the Mass Media.

Richard J. Harris, professor of psychology, brought the children to the class so his students could get first-hand information on the relationship of children with the media.

"The idea was to get reactions to television directly from children," Harris said. "All of our readings and what I present in class are from the adult perspective," Harris said.

Some members of the panel fidgeted because they weren't accustomed to being the focus of attention of a large group of people.

All of the children said they watch television daily. However, some, if given the choice to give up television or reading, said they would rather give up television.

Kaele Saal, 11, and Kiersten Saal, 15, watch no more than two hours of television a day. They don't have time to watch more, but they said they probably wouldn't watch more even if they could.

"I would probably read more," Kiersten Saal said.

Kevin Saal, 9, said he would rather give up reading. He said reading involves too much work because a person must visualize all the scenes.

"You don't have to do anything. You just have to watch (television)," Kevin said.

All the children agreed that television shows are not real. Many people are concerned that television distorts children's view of the world. In addition, the children said they don't care much for TV commercials because they take too much time.

"They're too long," said Justin McCoy, 4, but he did say he has toys advertised during children's programming.

The children said their parents do not interfere with their television viewing much, although the younger children had their viewing restricted more than the older children.

Parents sometimes do discuss the television programs children watch, they said. Parents ask the children what they think is happening in the shows.

Taiwan becoming freer, orator says

By TED MCFEETERS
Collegian Reporter

Taiwan is moving toward a democratization and freer government due to changes in the economy and the overall attitude of the Taiwanese people.

During a speech Friday, "Democratization in Taiwan," Thomas Gold, professor of sociology at the University of California-Berkeley, said Taiwan is now being looked on as a "miracle" country because the people of Taiwan have built up a remarkable economic system over the years. The economy's projected 1987 growth rate will be about 8 percent.

In 1986, Taiwan's per capita gross national product was about $3,000, and 1987 estimations could increase the per capita GNP to more than $4,000, Gold said.

"They are now moving to a higher-tech industry," Gold said. "(Taiwan) has moved to producing computers, appliances and now even cars."

Taiwan has become an "export-driven machine," but the country has not always been in this category, he said. Exports have been increasing, while Taiwan imports have been reduced.

Consumer prices have stabilized with no real inflation since the '50s, he added.

"They are moving from a closed economy to a more open economy," Gold said. "(Exports and imports) are highly protected by tariffs."

The educational system has become competitive in the last couple of years. Gold said 25 percent of the Taiwanese people are attending some form of school. One-fifth of the government budget is allocated toward the educational system, he said.

The people of Taiwan regard themselves as middle class, having the ability to move higher in the social system through economic means.

"I saw more BMWs in Taiwan than I saw in San Francisco," Gold said. "Now they own VCRs and travel abroad quite frequently."

Greek Week skit competitors play to near-sellout crowd in McCain

By The Collegian Staff

Participants in Saturday night's Greek Follies skit competition demonstrated to a crowd of of nearly 1,800 in McCain Auditorium that "It's Hip to be Greek."

Follies, a show of four skits done by members of fraternities and sororities, was the final competition in Greek Week.

This year group No. 1 grabbed the title for best overall skit. It's members included Sigma Sigma Sigma, Alpha Chi Omega, Pi Beta Phi, Lambda Chi Alpha, Alpha Tau Omega, Delta Upsilon, Acacia and Phi Kappa Theta.

"We had excellent participation this year," said Mary Vanier, junior in animal sciences and industry and Greek Week coordinator. "People had a good time and participation from the houses all week long was great."

Follies best actor went to Steve Brisendine, senior in English. Juli Kramer, sophomore in business administration, was awarded best actress. Group No. 3 won top spot in the category of best music and choreography. Members included Alpha Xi Delta, Kappa Alpha Theta, Alpha Delta Pi, Alpha Gamma Rho, Sigma Phi Epsilon, Phi Delta Theta, Triangle and Delta Sigma Phi.

Each year greek houses select a graduating senior from their house as a candidate for greek ambassador, judged on scholastic achievements and campus and community involvement. One ambassador each is selected from sororities and fraternities.

The 1987 sorority ambassador was Sherri Caster, senior pre-physical therapy. Larry Butel, senior in agricultural mechanization, and Bill Petrie, senior in agricultural economics, tied for greek ambassador in the fraternity category.

Mall bricks to 'get personal'

By TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

To involve the community in the construction of the Manhattan Town Center mall, Manhattan Main Street Project is selling personalized bricks and using them in the mall's plaza area.

For $20, students and Manhattan residents can have their names engraved on bricks to be used in the west entrance to the mall.

Money generated by the brick sales will be used to engrave the bricks, replace bricks damaged in shipping and cover administrative costs. All of the money from sales will be used in some way in the plaza area of the mall.

The Main Street Project is under contract with the Manhattan City Commission, therefore, excess money will be used under the discretion of the city commission, said Brenda Spencer, project manager of the project.

The use of the money depends on the number of bricks sold, Spencer said.

The money could be placed in an endowment that would continually benefit the mall through maintenance or through an entertainment program that would plan a series of ongoing activities for the mall, she said.

Project workers are placing bricks randomly in the plaza area's sidewalks, although final placement of the bricks depends on the number sold, she said.

Before April 1, the project accepted only individual names on the bricks, but after a number of requests, family names are being taken, Spencer said.

Spencer said she believes the brick sales reflect the community's support for the mall.

"Building the mall is probably the biggest thing Manhattan has seen for a long time," Spencer said. "Graduates can leave their mark in it by having their names permanently engraved in a brick."

The Main Street Project is using block lettering for the names and no artwork. The biggest stipulation is limiting names to 20 characters.

Football team concludes first week of drills

After the conclusion of the first week of practices, K-State's football coach Stan Parrish is encouraged by his players' enthusiasm as things start to take shape for the 1987 football campaign.

"We've worked hard and we've made good progress in the off-season, so we've had a good week so far and we're pleased," Parrish said.

After Friday's practice, Parrish said it will take a while for his rookies to familiarize themselves with the technical aspects of K-State's football program.

"We've worked everybody, but it just takes the newer kids some time to learn. We've done a lot of good things and the kids have had a good attitude and hustled well, so we've had a good week so far," Parrish said.

Rolling into this week, Parrish said, the team must continue to improve.

Track meet's quality satisfies coach

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

The KSU-Pepsi Open Track Meet held this weekend at R.V. Christian track had a little bit of everything to offer track fans attending.

On one side of the field, one could watch Olympian Doug Lytle battle it out at the pole vault pit with veteran vaulters Jeff Buckingham and Steve Stubblefield. While on the other side, K-State's Pinkie Suggs was en route to setting new meet and stadium records in the shot put and discus.

It was the quality of performers and their performances that left K-State Coach John Capriotti pleased with the daylong event.

"I think a lot of teams are going to go home happy today," Capriotti said. "There were a lot of good performances by other schools. In a meet like this, you're just looking to see where your people are at this point of the season."

Nearly the entire K-State men's and women's team participated in the open, non-scoring meet, and Capriotti said he couldn't be happier with what he saw.

Besides Suggs' victories, six other K-State athletes won in their respective events.

Kenny Harrison easily won in the triple jump with a national qualifying mark of 53-feet-9½, John Williams won the 100-meter dash, Aaron Roberson took honors in the 400-meter hurdles and Jeff Reynolds — after being injured for most of the indoor season — won the 400-meter dash.

On the women's side, Anita Isom won in the 100-yard dash, and Felicia Carpenter in the long jump.

Other K-State standouts were Ken Nash, second in the discus, while junior redshirt Anne Stadler with Jacque Struckhoff and Betsy Silzer finished first, second and third, respectively, in the 1500-meter run.

Others placing were Wendy Adkins, second

WILDCAT WELLNESS

"Your lifestyle is you. You are what you eat, drink, breathe, think and do. Therefore, what you become tomorrow depends upon what you do today. You are the only person in the world who can do what is necessary to make you healthy and happy." John C. McCamy, M.D.

The power to be healthy is in your hands. You can do more for your health than your physician. Learn to listen to what your body is saying, and learn to respond to what it tells you. Your body's messages of pain or pleasure, hunger or fatigue are your guideposts to survival. To ignore, deny or disguise them is to risk irreversible damage to your health.

We challenge you to stop and take a good look at your body, your mental attitudes and your lifestyle. Cigarettes, alcohol, drugs, fat and inactivity are all forms of slow suicide. Self-help in health can mean detecting and treating medical problems yourself. It also means maintaining a lifestyle with a balanced diet, enough sleep, regular exercise and a stable, serene mental outlook. The rewards are great, but you have to work for them. Grandma always said, "An ounce of prevention is worth a pound of cure."

You will not only live longer, feel better and have more energy, but you will establish a strong constitution with which to prevent and fight disease.

If a medical problem does arise and medical care is necessary, remember that we are here to serve you. Your health is our concern and our business.

OUR NEWEST SERVICE TO YOU

March 4 marked the official opening of the new Eriksen Sports Medicine Clinic located in the lower level of Lafene Health Center. Under the direction of Dr. Guy Smith, the clinic will function as an integrating system of health care provided for the recreational athlete, as well as for those individuals focusing on physical fitness activities.

Due to many misconceptions or to the lack of information, many sports related injuries that occur go untreated daily. The injured individual may not know where to go, or if they need to seek medical care at all. Dr. Smith is available to evaluate and treat such acute injuries. But the purpose of the clinic does not stop there. Their goal is to also offer information on how to avoid such injuries before they occur.

An additional feature of this facility is to get underway this Spring with the installation of a Heat Stress Monitor. This device will collect specific environmental data—radiate heat, humidity and temperature. Once gathered, the device will then provide risk levels for the outdoor athlete to use in determining the level of risk in exercising at that particular time to prevent heat-related injuries. The levels of risk for the college aged conditioned person according to the heat stress temperature are:

Above 90 F. = Extreme Risk
86-89.9 F. = High Risk
82-85.9 F. = Moderate Risk
78-81.9 F. = Low Risk

The Sports Medicine Clinic has a lot to offer the sports minded individual—those participating in intramural sports, those who exercise on their own and those who participate in university sports. Come check us out and become familiar with the newest service available to you at LAFENE HEALTH CENTER.

•Good news for aching athletes: A new study shows that only two percent of amateur athletes who were sidelined with injuries had to give up their sport permanently.

THE ONE MOST IMPORTANT DIET CHANGE . . .

If you were to make only one dietary change to improve your own health, make it this: Cut down the amount of fat you eat. Choosing low-fat foods can improve your overall health and reduce your chances of developing high blood cholesterol, a high-risk factor for heart disease. Diets high in fats and cholesterol are implicated in a half million heart-disease deaths yearly. Eating too much fat also contributes to obesity, a condition linked to such diseases as diabetes, arthritis and cancer.

Lowering your blood cholesterol levels—thus reducing your risk of coronary heart disease—isn't just a matter of what you don't eat, but what you do eat. The following are a few foods which are high in fat:

*Taco Salads—deep-fried shell, beef, sour cream, olives and cheese all high in fat.
*Hot dogs
*Nuts and peanut butter
*Granola cereal and granola bars
*Avocados
*Coconuts
*Quiche and croissants

It's never too late to make some dietary changes that could result in substantial differences in your health tomorrow.

FAT IS FAT IS FAT. . .

Fat. Few of us want it, but millions of us have too much of it. And as a result, Americans, more than ever before, are attempting to lose extra pounds. More than 35% of us want to shed fifteen pounds or more.

One of the best-documented health risks of overweight is heart disease. Few college aged individuals seriously focus today on a disease that usually strikes tomorrow. However, overweight itself does not cause heart disease directly. It combines with other risk factors to set up the conditions in which heart disease develops. The fat cells seldom develop overnight therefore, the damaging results seldom appear today either. Overweight people have higher risks of heart disease, high blood pressure, high cholesterol and diabetes. But more importantly, being overweight as a young adult, you are setting yourself up for these damaging and life threatening complications to develop in later years.

Each of us has our own body composition, our own proportion of fat to lean tissue. The best way to start a program for weight control is to find out our actual body composition—the relative amount of fat and muscle in our bodies. A chart that tells the "ideal" weights for various heights may tell us that we are overweight when in fact, our bodies contain only a little fat. Many athletes weigh more than the "correct" weight, and the scales reflect the large amount of muscle in their bodies. This is because muscle weighs more than fat does.

Our bodies are made up of two basic components—lean tissue and fatty tissue. Lean tissue includes muscle, bone, cartilage, connective tissue, skin and nerves. Some fat is necessary to stay alive — essential fat. It forms part of the chain of chemical reactions by which we store nutrients from our food and burn them up to get energy. If the body's level of essential fat falls below a certain minimum, such as what often happens is the case of the anorexic individual, then your health suffers.

Underneath our skin, and around our internal organs to protect them from injury, we have storage fat. Women generally have an extra layer of fat under their skin and fat deposits on their breasts and lower bodies, probably because it is important for healthy childbearing and other functions that rely on the hormones stored in fatty tissues.

Although we know that too much storage fat is unhealthy, it can be hard to specify exactlay what "too much" is. The best amount of fat varies with each body but a good guideline is not more than 15% of total body weight as fat for men and no more than 25% for women. With the use of an Electronic Body Fat Calculator, we can accurately measure an individual's percentage of body fat by measuring the fat under the skin, where about half of our fat is located. From these measurements, we can figure the ratio of fat.

It is hard to draw a sharp dividing line between normal weight and obesity. You cannot tell a person's fat level simply by his or her appearance. But there seems to be a normal range of body weight fat. Once people go much above that range, it is likely that they are obese.

To find out your accurate percentage of body fat of for more information, stop by our new ERIKSEN SPORTS MEDICINE CLINIC, located in the lower level of LAFENE HEALTH CENTER or call 532-7880 for an appointment.

LET'S GET PHYSICAL. . .

Aerobic exercise means "the ability of the body to do work using oxygen." To understand this concept, remember that as the body exercises, it's oxygen needs increase. Aerobic exercise is sustained exercise at a level that allows the body to meet it's oxygen needs continually. Some examples are vigorous walking, jogging, jumping rope, biking, swimming, cross-country skiing, and aerobic dance class.

The cardiovascular-respiratory exercise improves your physical health by making the heart, lungs, and blood vessels work harder. Your body responds by adapting. The muscle develops a more extensive blood vessel network. The lungs can take in and breathe out more air. The heart can become stronger and more efficient with training. Overall, the benefits can be great:

- Improved sense of well being
- Lower Blood Pressure
- Easier weight loss
- Improved sugar utilization
- Increased bone mass
- Improved lung function
- Lower cholesterol
- Reduced risk of cardiovascular disease

When it comes to exercise, Americans often seem to do either too much or too little. Remember, exercise is a long term project. Fitness does not come overnight. Set some goals for yourself and approach them gradually to avoid aches and pains or serious medical complications. The motto of most of most physical fitness experts is "train don't strain." Listen to your body as you exercise and don't push it when it complains. One valuable tool used to measure exertion level and impending fatigue during exercise is the Borg scale of rated perceived exertion (RPE). The chart shows the relationship between exertion rating and the per cent of maxium exercise capacity.

What is essential for lifetime fitness is regular vigourous exercise, involving the entire body, in a program that is tailored to the individual. Once the type of activity is determined, for maximum benefits, it is recommended to exercise three times weekly — every other day — for 30 minutes in duration.

If your normal daily activities do not provide aerobic fitness, it is our suggestion to you to begin today. You will reap all the benefits. Most of all, you will feel better, like yourself more, and you will probably live a longer, healthier life.

WE HEARD YOU

We asked you to tell us how we could improve our services for you. You told us. We listened. One improvement you asked for was more privacy during intake at the nurses stations. Major remodeling has been completed to accomplish that privacy. The "horse stalls" or, as some have referred to them, the "betting windows" have been removed and intake interviewing is now conducted in private offices. If you haven't been to Lafene Health Center recently, please come in and see the new remodeling. We are very pleased with its appearance and utility. We believe you will be pleased, also.

Football team concludes first week of drills

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

After the conclusion of the first week of practices, K-State's football coach Stan Parrish is encouraged by his players' enthusiasm as things start to take shape for the 1987 football campaign.

"We've worked hard and we've made good progress in the off-season, so we've had a good week so far and we're pleased," Parrish said.

After Friday's practice, Parrish said it will take a while for his rookies to familiarize themselves with the technical aspects of K-State's football program.

"We're still evaluating and they're still learning. Particularly the junior college guys that just got here. They're still learning what's going on and it's going to take them a couple of weeks to get their feet on the ground and get everything going.

"We've worked everybody, but it just takes the newer kids some time to learn. We've done a lot of good things and the kids have had a good attitude and hustled well, so we've had a good week so far," Parrish said.

Rolling into this week, Parrish said, the team must continue to improve.

"We'll try to pick up and expand on things a little bit to...eliminate the mistakes. We've made too many mistakes, but that's to be expected the first week. We've just got to get better," Parrish said.

Track meet's quality satisfies coach

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

The KSU-Pepsi Open Track Meet held this weekend at R.V. Christian track had a little bit of everything to offer track fans attending.

On one side of the field, one could watch Olympian Doug Lytle battle it out at the pole vault pit with veteran vaulters Jeff Buckingham and Steve Stubblefield. While on the other side, K-State's Pinkie Suggs was en route to setting new meet and stadium records in the shot put and discus.

It was the quality of performers and their performances that left K-State Coach John Capriotti pleased with the daylong event.

"I think a lot of teams are going to go home happy today," Capriotti said. "There were a lot of good performances by other schools. In a meet like this, you're just looking to see where your people are at this point of the season."

Nearly the entire K-State men's and women's team participated in the open, non-scoring meet, and Capriotti said he couldn't be happier with what he saw.

Besides Suggs' victories, six other K-State athletes won in their respective events.

Kenny Harrison easily won in the triple jump with a national qualifying mark of 53-feet-9½, John Williams won the 100-meter dash, Aaron Roberson took honors in the 400-meter hurdles and Jeff Reynolds — after being injured for most of the indoor season — won the 400-meter dash.

On the women's side, Anita Isom won in the 100-yard dash, and Felicia Carpenter in the long jump.

Other K-State standouts were Ken Nash, second in the discus, while junior redshirt Anne Stadler with Jacque Struckhoff and Betsy Silzer finished first, second and third, respectively, in the 1500-meter run.

Others placing were Wendy Adkins, second

WINNING DIETS FOR ATHLETES

Competitive athletes—from the marathon lanes, to the tennis courts, to the football fields—of all ages, are getting in shape to be competitive. But there is more to training than a good workout. Attaining a winning edge means combining a program that yields good conditioning.

Most adults are all too familiar with the four basic food groups, and the need to choose a combination of meats, fruits, vegetables, milk and grains. But for the physically active and competitive individual, the calorie count is also important. Caloric needs vary with the individual's age, sex and activity level. The average person needs 1,200 to 1,500 calories daily. Most athletes, however, require a minimum of 2,000 calories a day to maintain normal activity and sustain a training program. Additionally, more calories should come from complex carbohydrate foods such as breads, cereals, pastas, fruits and vegetables.

Contrary to popular belief, superior athletic performance does not require an increased intake of protein. Most Americans eat more protein than recommended, and too much can be harmful — dehydrating the body and overburdening the kidneys. To increase muscle growhth, increased calories, not protein, should be teamed wth exercise.

Another myth involves the benefit of the traditional steak-and-eggs pre-competition meal. Such a meal does not provide the athlete with any advantage, and because of the high fat and high protein content, may take up to six hours to be digested.

By contrast, an athlete who refrains from eating at all before a competition may have difficulty maintaining adequate glucose levels. A high-carbohydrate, moderate protein, low-fat meal eaten 2 to 3 hours before competition is best or maximum performance.

Although carbohydrates should make up a major part of the pre-competition meal, foods high in sugar should be avoided less than an hour before the event. Instead of increasing available energy, the sugar in the food actually decreases energy because it stimulates insulin production and lowers blood glucose.

Proper nutrition should go hand-in-hand with a workable exercise program. For more information or if you have questions about a fitness program designed specifically for you and your needs, contact our SPORTS MEDICINE CLINIC at 532-7880.

A ROYAL PAIN IN THE SIDE

Maybe you call it a "stitch in the side," or maybe you don't call it anything—you just flinch. It's a sharp temporary pain in the abdomen, and it usually befalls people when they are walking or running. Despite the momentary agony, it is not cause for alarm and certainly is not the beginning of a heart attack or appendicitis.

"The pain is a spasm of the diaphragm muscle," according to Ben Benjamin, Ph.D., expert in sports-medicine and primary author of Listen to Your Pain. If the diaphragm is not properly warmed up before exercise, or it is strained more than usual, it can go into automatic involuntary contractions—the so-called painful stitch. If you let up on your activity a bit or take a rest, the spasm usually disappears. The episode is a reminder to take it easy next time.

WALKING—ONE OF THE BEST FOR ALL

Exercise can be as simple as a brisk stroll. And walking is fast becoming the hottest form of exercise going. Studies show that people who "brisk" walk for 20-30 minutes (on a regular basis) can enhance muscle strength, reduce teir blood pressure and pulse rate and increase the efficiency of their heart and lungs.

Over 55 million Americans now list walking as their favorite form of exercise. Why?

No risk. Unlike jogging, walking is not linked to joint injuries.
No limits. Virtually everyone, regardless of age, can enjoy walking.
Convenient and inexpensve.
Big gains. Done right, walking provides all the benefits of exercise.

A HEALTHY TAN— IS IT POSSIBLE?

Tanned skin hasn't always been fashionable. In the 1700s a European custom insisted that women wear a lead-based makeup to keep their skin as pale as possible. The results of this fad made their hair and teeth fall out and caused mental illness. And why did they persist even after finding out the effects? It was a fashion, just as the tan is a fashion today. Today's fashion also results in many harmful effects making the so-called "healthy tan" unhealthy. Cancer of the skin is the most common of all cancers. Over 400,000 new cases are reported every year, with overexposure to ultraviolet rays as the leading cause. With warm weather soon upon us, it is important to realize that habitual sunbathing can cause skin cancer. People with fair skin and red or blond hair are the most prone to develop skin cancer, but skin cancer has also been reported in people with deep brown or black skin.

Seeking a tan is a personal decision. Good sense and simple measures, however, should be used when working or playing in the sun:

Use sunscreens. A sunscreen acts as a filter: the higher the number, the more protection the sunscreen offers. Liberal, regular use of sunscreens may help reduce the incidence of skin cancer and help protect from repeated sunburns which are particularly risky.

Know the ray. Stay out of the direct sun at midday, especially between 11 a.m. and 2 p.m. Beware of high altitudes since there is less atmosphere to filter out the ultraviolet rays.

Avoid overexposure. Repeated overexposure to ultraviolet rays is the principal cause of skin cancer. No one is immune.

Tanning booths or beds and sunlamps have also been found to be dangerous to your skin and health. In addition to giving off ultraviolet rays that can cause eye injuries and skin burns, they also can be highly dangerous and change cell structure. Such changes are known as mutations and some mutations are cancerous.

If you feel the cosmetic benefit of a tan outweighs the risk . . . think again. The risk could be deadly.

Football team concludes first week of drills

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

After the conclusion of the first week of practices, K-State's football coach Stan Parrish is encouraged by his players' enthusiasm as things start to take shape for the 1987 football campaign.

"We've worked hard and we've made good progress in the off-season, so we've had a good week so far and we're pleased," Parrish said.

After Friday's practice, Parrish said it will take a while for his rookies to familiarize themselves with the technical aspects of K-State's football program.

"We're still evaluating and they're still learning. Particularly the junior college guys that just got here. They're still learning what's going on and it's going to take them a couple of weeks to get their feet on the ground and get everything going.

"We've worked everybody, but it just takes the newer kids some time to learn. We've done a lot of good things and the kids have had a good attitude and hustled well, so we've had a good week so far," Parrish said.

Rolling into this week, Parrish said, the team must continue to improve.

"We'll try to pick up and expand on things a little bit to...eliminate the mistakes. We've made too many mistakes, but that's to be expected the first week. We've just got to get better," Parrish said.

As far as the up-for-grabs quarterback position is concerned, returning Westminster, Calif., senior Tim Hanson and Snow Community College (Utah) transfer Gary Swim have been working in alternation with K-State's first offense.

"That's where we're at right now. They've both done some good things each day, but they've both been inconsistent, too. But they're progressing well," Parrish said.

Parrish said some key components in the receiving corps were on the injured list. Among those were wide receivers Eric Blades and Trinity Valley (Texas) junior college transfer Darrell Wyatt.

"We're down a couple of receivers right now, and that's not good for us. We've got decent team speed, but some of it's hurt and not practicing right now, and that's hard," Parrish said.

Track meet's quality satisfies coach

Pinkie Suggs eyes the shot as it leaves her fingertips en route to a school-record 54-9 1/4 during the KSU-Pepsi Invitational meet Saturday at R.V. Christian Track.

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

The KSU-Pepsi Open Track Meet held this weekend at R.V. Christian track had a little bit of everything to offer track fans attending.

On one side of the field, one could watch Olympian Doug Lytle battle it out at the pole vault pit with veteran vaulters Jeff Buckingham and Steve Stubblefield. While on the other side, K-State's Pinkie Suggs was en route to setting new meet and stadium records in the shot put and discus.

It was the quality of performers and their performances that left K-State Coach John Capriotti pleased with the daylong event.

"I think a lot of teams are going to go home happy today," Capriotti said. "There were a lot of good performances by other schools. In a meet like this, you're just looking to see where your people are at this point of the season."

Nearly the entire K-State men's and women's team participated in the open, non-scoring meet, and Capriotti said he couldn't be happier with what he saw.

Besides Suggs' victories, six other K-State athletes won in their respective events.

Kenny Harrison easily won in the triple jump with a national qualifying mark of 53-feet-9½, John Williams won the 100-meter dash, Aaron Roberson took honors in the 400-meter hurdles and Jeff Reynolds — after being injured for most of the indoor season — won the 400-meter dash.

On the women's side, Anita Isom won in the 100-yard dash, and Felicia Carpenter in the long jump.

Other K-State standouts were Ken Nash, second in the discus, while junior redshirt Anne Stadler with Jacque Struckhoff and Betsy Silzer finished first, second and third, respectively, in the 1500-meter run.

Others placing were Wendy Adkins, second in the javelin; Becky Ives, third in the 3,000-meter run; Joy Jones, third in the 400-meter dash; and Kelly Abernathy, third in the discus.

"Event after event, they all did a great job," Capriotti said. "It was a great meet for a lot of our people."

Competing for the first time this season, basketball player Steve Henson finished fourth in the high jump with a leap of 6-10, and third in the javelin with a toss of 206-3 despite only two days of practice in that event.

"I was really surprised with the javelin throw," Henson said. "I didn't practice much and was hoping to throw about 190 feet, so I'm pleased."

The meet recorded the first time this outdoor season that K-State competed against Big Eight Conference opponents. Attending the meet from the conference were Kansas, Iowa State, Nebraska and Oklahoma State.

Sooners sweep 4-game series from K-State's baseball squad

Special to the Collegian

NORMAN, Okla. — K-State's baseball team now can relate to the fishing tale of the big one that got away.

Oklahoma's Darron Cox hit a one-out home run in the bottom of the ninth inning Sunday to give fifth-ranked Oklahoma an 8-7 victory.

Cox hit the homer off a 1-0 pitch from losing pitcher Mike Hinkle to enable the Sooners, 24-6 overall and 4-0 in Big Eight Conference play, to sweep the four-game series from the Wildcats, 12-14 and 0-5.

In the first game, Oklahoma scored 11 times in the eighth inning to snap a scoreless tie and post an 11-0 triumph.

Oklahoma began the weekend series by swamping the 'Cats, 13-6 and 7-3, in Saturday's double-header.

In Sunday's second game, Jeff Turtle had given the 'Cats a 7-6 lead in the top of the seventh inning with his seventh home run of the season. But the Sooners tied the game in its half of the inning on two hits and a K-State fielding error.

K-State snapped a 4-4 deadlock in the third when Leo Seiler doubled and Tom Parsons walked to open the inning. Eric Haines singled to drive in Seiler, and Parsons scored when Scott Spangenberg hit into a double play.

Oklahoma knotted the score in the fifth on a two-run double by Glenn Sullivan after two singles and an error loaded the bases.

K-State took a 2-0 lead in the first on Seiler's RBI single and a bases-loaded walk to Parsons. The Wildcats increased their lead to 4-0 in the second on a run-scoring double by Hinkle and a Sooner error.

Oklahoma, however, rallied for four runs in the second on two walks, an error and three hits.

In Sunday's opener, Oklahoma broke a scoreless deadlock with an 11-run uprising in the eighth inning.

After a fly out to start the eighth, Mark Cole singled and Kevin Burdick doubled. K-State intentionally walked Oklahoma's Glenn Sullivan to load the bases, but Chris Ebright foiled that strategy by lining a single to right to bring in Cole.

On the ensuing throw to the plate, Oklahoma's Glenn Sullivan got caught in a rundown that allowed Burdick to score.

After an intentional pass to Steve Eckenrode loaded the bases and K-State's Marty Darnell relieved Kimbell, Jeff Rainey singled in a run and Robert Lavender — who had three doubles in the game — doubled to right to drive in two more.

Cox ripped a three-run homer while Burdick cracked a two-run shot to cap Oklahoma's rally.

K-State had threatened early in the contest as David Chadd doubled off Oklahoma's All-American pitcher Jack Armstrong to begin the second inning.

Chadd moved to third on a ground out, but stayed there as Armstrong fanned the final two batters of the frame.

K-State had another scoring opportunity in the fourth as Turtle walked with one out. With two outs, Seiler belted a double to center, but a perfect relay throw from Burdick nailed Turtle at the plate.

Oklahoma had a chance to score in the seventh when Lavender doubled with two outs and Cox singled to left. But 'Cat left fielder Russ Ringgenberg threw a strike to catcher Jeff Hulse to gun down Lavender.

Dera Clark, who relieved Armstrong in the sixth, received the victory. Kimbell, 2-2, took the loss for K-State.

In action Saturday, Ringgenberg started things out on a high note for the 'Cats as he began the opener with a home run to left. K-State added two more in the third off David Chadd's two-run shot to grab a 3-2 lead.

Oklahoma bounced back to score six runs in the fourth and went on to a 13-6 win.

K-State tennis team drops to OU, OSU

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

On the surface it appears the K-State women's tennis team didn't play too well this weekend against Oklahoma and Oklahoma State. But K-State Coach Steve Bietau said that wasn't the case.

"This was probably our best Oklahoma weekend yet," he said. "We played pretty well. I was concerned (because) we hadn't played in two weeks...I was happy to see how they played against OU."

K-State, 5-6, lost 8-1 Friday to Oklahoma and was blanked 9-0 Saturday by Oklahoma State. But it was an improvement from the fall season when the Wildcats were unable to take a set from the two schools in the last meeting.

Not only did the 'Cats take six sets away from their Big Eight Conference rivals this time around (five from Oklahoma and one from Oklahoma State), K-State player Lena Svensson — in her first appearance this season at No. 1 singles — defeated the Sooners' No. 1 player in three sets.

"We'd like to get more points, but you have to win sets before you can win matches," Bietau said. "We won more sets than we have before (against OU and Oklahoma State) this weekend."

Bietau said he is pleased with the squad's performance, but he realizes K-State, now 0-2 in Big Eight play, can do better.

"We can be better and we can win some matches off these (Big Eight) teams," Bietau said. "And as we get closer in the matches the players realize that."

School

Joleen Hill, a local apartment and land manager, said she can provide the school system with ideas which the system has perhaps not had before.

"I have been involved in education my whole life being a student or teacher or with my own children and I think it's important to have a broad-based representation on the board," Hill said.

Hill also believes communication is an issue.

"I think we have been negligent in communicating with the general public, not only the taxpayer. There are many of the taxpayers who do not have people in school and I am not sure they are aware of what's going on in the school," she said.

Jim Lindquist, director of the K-State-Riley County Cooperative Extension Service, said the board needs to make the best possible use of the dollars it receives.

"We have to establish priorities that are going to do the most good — looking at those various places where the money can be spent," Lindquist said. "We probably need to concentrate our money on teachers and teacher salaries — that's the area where we might be able to do the most to maintain and improve the quality of our schools."

Lindquist also said the board has the responsibility of setting the system's curriculum through teacher recommendations.

Mary Nichols, temporary instructor of speech, said due to the concern of having adequate funding for the schools, alternative sources must be found.

"We've got to look for creative solutions — grant applications and corporate funding," she said.

Nichols said the basics should be stressed, especially at the grade-school level.

"I want to keep the curriculum balanced, especially at the elementary level. I value extra-curricular activities for building self-esteem," she said.

Nichols said community involvement is a prime issue in the election.

"Seventy percent of the taxpayers in this area do not have children in the schools. You have to get out to the public and relay some of the positive things that are going on," she said.

Flordie Pettis, area manager of Social and Rehabilitation Services in Junction City, said she believes we are living in a world of change and curriculum must change accordingly.

"The curriculum must change as the times change. Right now we are looking at technology and languages. They will have to be integrated with strong basics," she said.

Pettis said she is no stranger to budget constraints and long-range planning.

"We need plans that outline our needs fully. Then we need to make our situation known to the public," Pettis said. "We can't work with a budget that is less than adequate."

Robert Shoop, professor of administration and foundations of education, said he believes it is most important for the board to work closely with the teachers and to help them identify what the board is doing.

Shoop said parents and teachers must be involved. The board can "restrain or curtail services offered," but it is up to the community to decide.

Shoop said it is important for a child's education to be well rounded.

"It is important to me that a child's education be well rounded including athletics, the arts and health — in addition to the basics," Shoop said.

Barbara Withee, current board member, said although Manhattan has a good school system, it needs a stronger curriculum.

"We have a good school system. We're on the right track. I believe the students need a more challenging curriculum," she said. "I'm lobbying a goal for a challenging international studies program. I believe students should be challenged but not left behind."

Clarenburg, professor of anatomy and physiology, and Eversmeyer, a guidance counselor at Manhattan High School and former English teacher, are the two candidates chosen in a March primary to be on the ballot for the board's two-year term.

Clarenburg, the current vice president of the school board, lists several goals he would like to accomplish if elected.

He said he would favor optimum use of instructional hours and quality of life education for students.

Clarenburg also said he would like to optimize the working conditions of teachers and administrators in the district, and promote productive harmonious relations between the school board, teachers, administrators and parents.

He said it is also important to keep a line open for the exchange of ideas with the public and provide people with accurate information.

Eversmeyer said the board needs to give students as much individual attention as possible, or otherwise "kids might slip through the cracks."

Eversmeyer said during the next few years there are issues the board will have to address including the drop-out rate, the shortage of good qualified teachers and the structure of the funding of education.

"I think board members are going to have to get as political as they possibly can to convince the public and legislators of the importance of funding for education," Eversmeyer said. "We also need to evaluate programs constantly to make sure we are addressing issues that keep coming up like AIDS, computer programming and foreign languages. We need to keep assessing."

City

the time to help see that things get done."

Richard Hayter, director of engineering extension at K-State, said "the city shouldn't dare do one project at the exclusion of another."

"I see the city commission relying heavily on merchants not only in Town Center but retailers throughout Manhattan including Westloop, Village Plaza and Aggieville," Hayter said.

Hayter said he believes the Seth Childs Road project should be the state's No. 1 priority for expansion due to traffic counts and statistics.

"My only concern with implementation of the Quality of Life Bond issue is that each of the projects that we promised the citizens will occur as they expected them to," he said. "The city commission should take an active role to oversee development so citizens receive what they were promised."

Roger Maughmer, supervisor of the local Southwestern Bell office said the commission needs to prioritize.

"My top priority is financial responsibility," Maughmer said. "The city government needs to learn to be financially responsible given the state and federal budget cuts.

"If I had to place (issues) in ranking order, the renovation of Seth Childs Road would be at the top of the list," he said. "The successful completion of downtown redevelopment and delivery of the Quality of Life Bond issue to the tax payers would be next," Maughmer said. "Then developing industrial park.

"I'm very interested in being involved with the city commission and my personal situation found me with the time to do so," Maughmer said.

Bob Newsome, K-State area extension director, said he believes if Manhattan is going to grow, not only will the commissioners need to work with Junction City commissioners but they must also find ways to pool their own resources in the best interest for Manhattan.

Newsome stressed the importance of K-State as the largest employer of Manhattan residents and that the city commission must be willing to work with the University.

The Quality of Life Bond issue and the Manhattan Town Center mall are two projects the commissioners must carry out during the upcoming term, he said.

A solution to the decrease in manpower available in the city, Newsome said, might be to hire retired people with experience in the building trades.

Ruth Schrum, teacher at Fort Riley Junior High School, said she understands the city and its needs.

"Reopening some of the streets and having a much better traffic plan for downtown is important," Schrum said. "I would like to encourage good traffic patterns.

"I encourage industry," she said. "I feel we already have industry here: the University, Fort Riley and Farm Bureau.

"We also need to look after what we already have such as McCall's which is a great resource for us," Schrum said.

Schrum said she believes any city is smart to have a four-lane access road leading to the city.

"We should have attractive entrances into Manhattan as well," Schrum said."

Subject: TEA Group Life Insurance

1. Special Enrollment Period -- March 27 to April 15, 1987.

More than 600 KSU faculty and staff currently have TEA Group Life Insurance. We want to give the rest of you the opportunity to obtain the lowest cost group life insurance available at KSU during TEA's Special Enrollment Period. Coverage for accepted new members will begin May 1, 1987.

2. TEA life insurance is often confused with KPERS life insurance.

To remove confusion we present some important facts about these two excellent life insurance programs:

-- KPERS (Kansas Public Employees Retirement System)
- is available in $5,000 increments
- is paid for by monthly payroll deduction
- is underwritten by Security Benefit Life Insurance (Topeka)
- is an excellent buy in insurance

-- TEA (Teachers and Employees Association), that's us, the other guys
- is available (for those under age 60) in two amounts, $30,000 and $50,000
- is paid for directly by the insured in one or two payments each year
- is underwritten by The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States
- is an even better buy than KPERS

Legal staffs study withdrawal from compact

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Citing "grave concerns," Gov. Mike Hayden said Monday he might call a special session of the Legislature to consider ending Kansas' participation in a regional compact for the disposal of low-level radioactive waste.

Hayden also said his legal staff and that of Attorney General Robert T. Stephan are studying the possibility of the state going to federal court to stop the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact from choosing a developer if the compact continues to rely on a study from a consulting firm it hired.

He said he wants a special meeting of the compact before the end of the month to discuss the concerns of Kansas and other states.

In addition, Hayden announced he is setting up a interagency task force, led by Lt. Gov. Jack Walker, who is also acting secretary of health and environment. The task force will review the compact's actions and all legal aspects of the state's participation in it.

He also urged lawmakers to pass a bill that would ban the burial of low-level radioactive waste. The measure was scheduled for Senate debate Tuesday.

Hayden made public a letter from Walker to Raymond Peery, executive director of the compact, asking for a meeting.

In response, Peery said in a telephone interview he understands Hayden's concerns about the state's participation in the compact and said the commission would meet by the end of the month to discuss them.

"Kansas, like all other states, faces fast-approaching federal deadlines for waste disposal," Hayden told a Statehouse news conference. "We must move forward in our efforts to find the safest and most logical course to follow."

However, Hayden backed away from saying he would like to see the state pull out of the compact. In the past, he has said there are more advantages to staying in it.

"There are up sides and down sides to going it on your own," Hayden said. "That is an option we have not ruled out."

The compact has become a hot issue because of two deadlines — the June 5 deadline set by the compact for selecting a site developer and the 1988 deadline set by Congress for compacts for selecting host states. Regional dump sites must be in operation by 1993.

Legislators have expressed concern about the state's participation in the 5-year-old compact with Arkansas, Louisiana, Nebraska and Oklahoma because of a "Phase 2" study completed for the compact in February. The study, done by Dames and Moore, a Pearl River, N.Y., consulting firm, identified 147 possible sites for a regional dump, of which 109 are in Kansas.

Officials of the Kansas Geological Survey criticized the study in testimony before lawmakers last week, saying it showed a lack of ignorance of local geology in many cases. They also have questioned the firm's methods for doing an earlier study.

The Senate Energy and Natural Resources Committee voted unanimously last week to declare the second study "faulty."

Peery, the compact's executive director, has told lawmakers he would recommend that the compact commission reject the $150,000 study. However, the commission's chairman, L. Hall Bohlinger of Louisiana, later said the study should not be rejected.

Dancers to display talents

By STACEY NANNINGA
Collegian Reporter

After two weeks of dance workshops, "Crystal Sentiment" is the creative result of the combined efforts of free-lance dancer and choreographer Karen Steele and eight dance students.

The students will present the choreography among other pieces at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday at the dance department's annual "SpringDance" recital in McCain Auditorium.

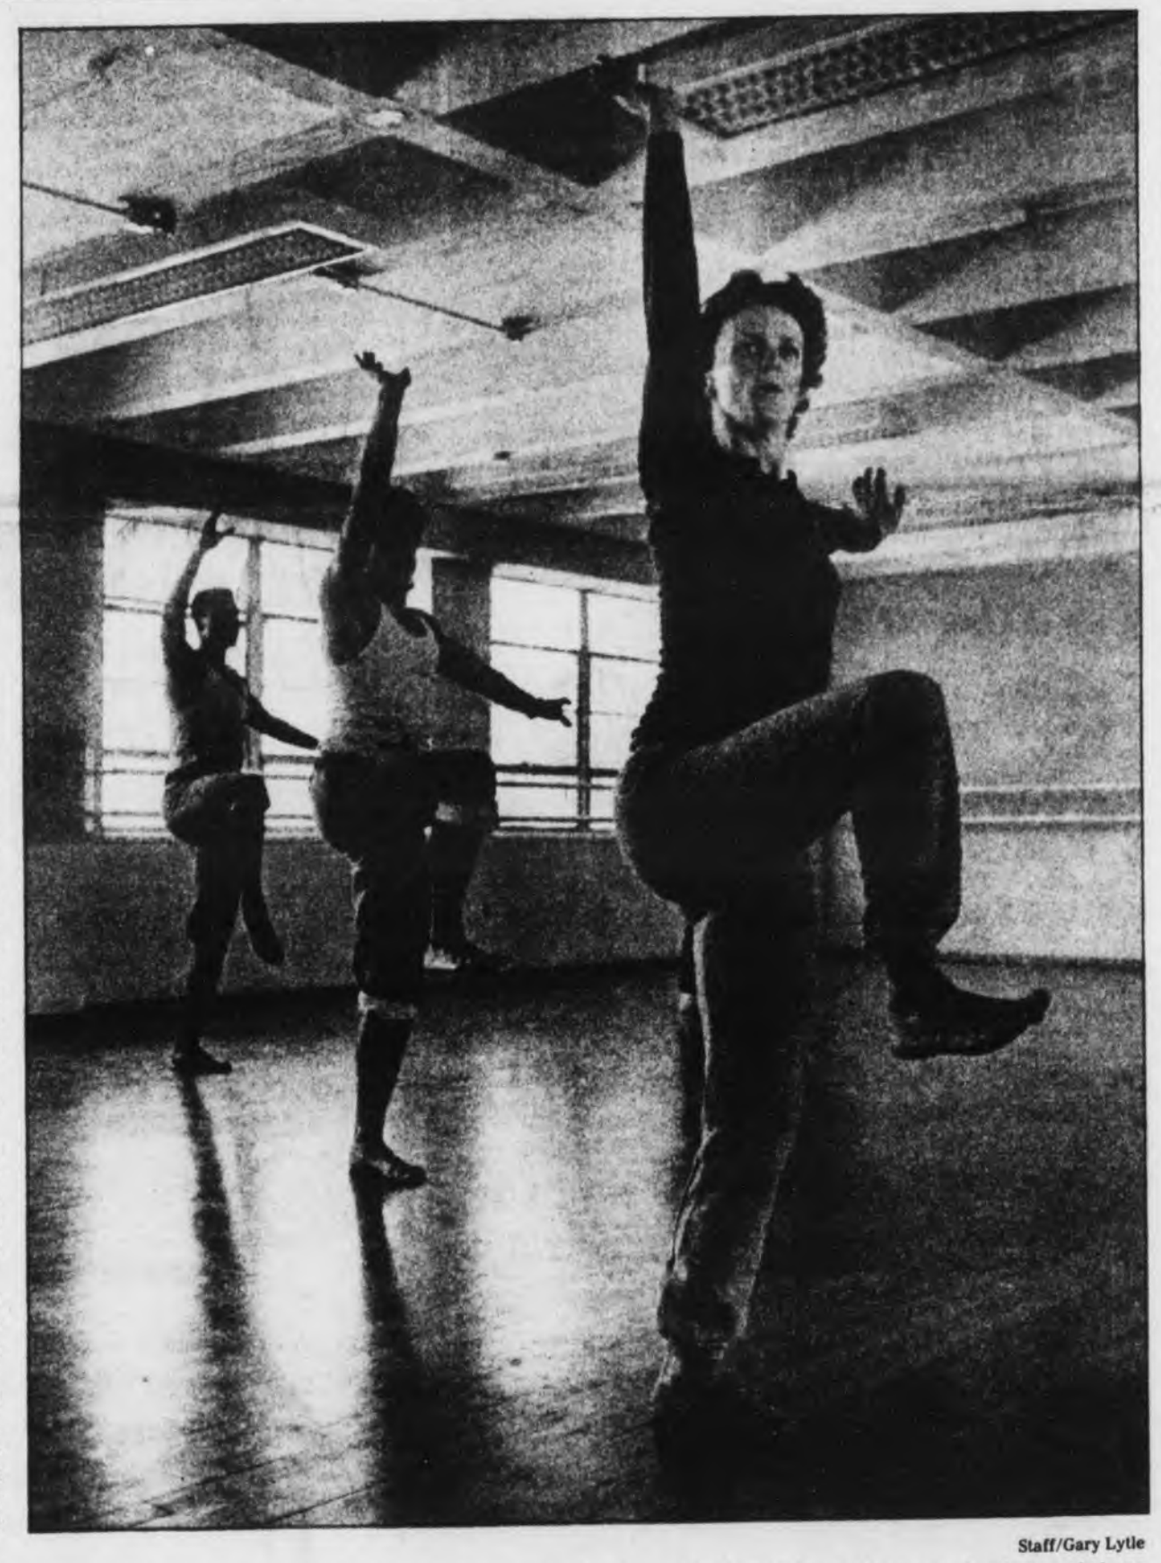
A resident of Boulder, Colo., Steele has been dancing since second grade. She danced ballet before going to college, where she got her first taste of modern dance.

"When you like something, you just keep doing it," she said. "Dancing is something I enjoy, and I have made my career out of it."

Steele attended both Southern Methodist University, Dallas, and the University of Utah, Salt Lake City.

After graduating, she traveled with the Utah Repertory Dance Theater and the Lar Lubovitch Dance Company in New York City. Later, Steele directed her own dance company in Santa Fe, N.M.

For the last two years Steele has taught in Boulder at the Naropa Institution, a school founded from Buddhist origins that integrates Eastern and Western philosophies into its education.



Steele travels throughout the United States conducting dance workshops and choreographing dance concerts.

She enjoys teaching advanced and beginning dance students alike.

"I believe that dance is a good exercise for everyone," she said. "It teaches (people) to relax and how to stretch, which is important in our society today that is full of stress.

"Teaching dance is like telling

Lab expansion sets supercomputer link

By TOM DENZEL
Collegian Reporter

As part of the $6.2 million expansion of the Macdonald Laboratory, scheduled for completion next year, K-State now has a direct link to the U.S. Department of Energy's supercomputer in Livermore, Calif.

The supercomputer is indeed super, demonstrated by its ability to disseminate information in seconds, minutes and hours that used to take weeks, months and years to compile.

"These supercomputers are 100 to 500 times faster than ordinary computers and cost about 10 times as much," said Robert Panoff, assistant professor of physics.

Access to the supercomputer is not limited to atomic physics, but will also involve studies in engineering, social and physical sciences, and agriculture, he said.

A federal commission determined two years ago that the government needed to give scientists access to supercomputers for basic research.

"Now we have the accessibility and opportunity to use these supercomputers for research and in understanding and establishing prevention measures for such things as natural disasters, crop formation and the fundamental sciences," Panoff said.

Panoff teaches "Computational Physics 802," a course that allows graduate students to learn how to use and understand the supercomputers' functions while gaining valuable hands-on experience.

Three components make the computer "super:" the individual processors within the computer, the architectural design and/or its vectorization and the parallelism.

Panoff said the individual processors within the computer create a tremendous time-saving element.

"Supercomputers are designed to exploit better processor technology (by) being able to compute calculations faster," he said.

The other two elements increase the amount of data that can be processed, Panoff said.

Vectorization allows the supercomputer to compute many pieces of the same data at the same time, while parallelism in the system utilizes many different pieces of data at the same time, he said.

"The biggest obstacle to science we had was isolation, but now with the supercomputers, the ability to interact with all the other sciences is possible," Panoff said. "The information and results that now can be found almost instantly are unlimited."

Panoff cited one example of the amount of time saved with the help of supercomputers, which are about the size of two 5-foot file cabinets with a price tag from $20-$80 million.

While at Washington University in St. Louis, Panoff spent 18 months completing the mathematical calculations for one chapter of his doctoral dissertation. Having the access to the Livermore supercomputer, he duplicated the same calculations in three hours.

"What took months and years for us to calculate, understand, define and put into use now takes only weeks, days and even hours to accomplish the same amount of work and still be relevant enough to the present needs and interests," he said.

To better utilize the supercomputer and to minimize the costs, K-State, the University of Kansas and seven other Midwestern research universities joined Midnet last fall.

When fully operational later this year, Midnet, a data and computer network, will give the universities direct access to the National Center for Supercomputing Application at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign and access to similar NSF-funded centers in New York, Pennsylvania, California and New Jersey.

Currently, the DOE is leasing a line exclusively from AT&T, connecting Manhattan to Los Alamos, N.M., where data is then transmitted by satellite to Livermore.

One reason research has been lagging throughout the nation is the obstacle of isolation.

Johnson, Traeger discuss tenure in campus leadership roles

Steven Johnson

When does someone start planning to run for Student Body President? For Steven Johnson, former student body president, the time was less than six months before the elections.

"Six months before the elections, I was not thinking of going after (the position)," said Johnson, junior in agricultural economics.

"I was interested in student government. I was thinking more along the lines of maybe a committee chair," he said. "So I got involved and tried to get myself informed."

Johnson said he was interested in student government when he first came to K-State, but it wasn't until after he came back to school for his sophomore year that he decided to run for the office.

In addition to fulfilling the ceremonial duties of the office, such as taking part in the groundbreaking ceremony for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum, Johnson fulfilled his administrative duties — stirring up some controversy in the process.

A veto of the representation enhancement bill, which would have provided for Senate representatives of living groups as well as colleges, was one of the most controversial of Johnson's actions while in office, and something Johnson counts as one of the biggest accomplishments of his term.

"I know that was a very strong position to take, and I regret the way it slowed the momentum of the issue," he said, but he did not like the way the proposal had been introduced in Senate and the direction it had been taking.

"It went to the Student Senate and we said, 'OK, here we are you guys. We have this bill. You vote against it, you're greeks,'" Johnson said. "You're going to look terrible."

Although controversial, the veto gave the representation issue somewhat of a positive direction, he said.

"I think we need to involve more people from all the areas affected by this and get their input," Johnson said.

A petition about representation was circulated that made a strong push to attract students living in residence halls, saying their representation would increase from one senator to five official representatives, Johnson said. In the 1986-87 Senate, one college senator resided in a residence hall.

Although this is true, the petition didn't mention the fact that 14 off-campus representatives would also be added and the net benefit for dormitory residents would be negated, he said.

Another problem Johnson said he saw with the vetoed proposal was the Opening up direct lines of communication between student legislators and their constitutents was the biggest accomplishment Sally Traeger, former Student Senate chairwoman, said she made during her term.

"We have for the first time set up a means by which students can directly contact their senators," said Traeger, senior in marketing. "That, of course, is through the Student Senate Hotline."

Traeger concluded her one-year term in February after the 1987 Senate elected Michelle Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, Student Senate chairwoman.

In addition to the hotline, office hours for senators were instituted in the Student Governing Services office each week during regular business hours, she said.

"This is the kind of service that Senate, in my opinion, was established to give," Traeger said.

Before the hotline was established, students could call the SGS office and ask for the telephone number of a senator from their college, but that rarely happened, Traeger said.

The hotline was a joint effort between Senate and the University administration, which finances the phone line, she said.

Although the Student Senate Hotline was one accomplishment of which she was proud, Traeger said she was not satisfied with the outcome of an unsuccessful bill providing for representation enhancement.

Had it passed, the proposal would have called for a student referendum to decide whether representation should be changed from the current system of selecting senators based on colleges to a system in which half the senators were elected from colleges and the other half from living groups.

"I feel like the whole movement was defeated by several things, including a Senate which was incapable of judging itself," Traeger said.

In this case, she said the proposed representation enhancement referendum was defeated by the prevailing powers in Senate.

Senate passed the bill, but former Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, vetoed the measure.

"In any organization if (members) have a vested interest, no matter how you try to word (legislation), you're going to have certain inherent biases that will lead you to changes in directions," Traeger said. "In this case, the changes were overshadowed by the status quo.

"I just feel for the amount of Treaty would limit pollution levels

OTTAWA — President Reagan said Monday there are "no quick and easy answers" for curbing acid rain, but he agreed to consider a Canadian proposal for a treaty requiring lower pollution levels by an agreed date.

Reagan made his surprise offer in a speech to Parliament after Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney told the same audience, "In this matter, time is not our ally but our enemy. The longer we delay, the greater the cost."

The agreement to consider holding negotiations on the issue allowed the two leaders to wind up a 24-hour visit by Reagan on an upbeat note.

Earlier, both sides predicted there would be no agreements, and U.S. officials said privately that a treaty was not the correct way to combat pollution, particularly since various technologies are being explored to fight it.

Calling acid rain a two-nation problem requiring a two-nation solution, Mulroney said: "I urgently invite the United States administration and the American Congress to join with this Parliament and the government of Canada in concluding a firm, bilateral accord which will provide a North American solution to acid rain."

Reagan, departing from his prepared text in his speech minutes later, said he had "agreed to consider" Mulroney's proposal, "building on the tradition of agreements to control pollution of our shared interior waters," referring to the Great Lakes.

Smoking 'in designated areas only'

TOPEKA — Smoking would be banned unless otherwise designated in all retail stores, restaurants and public buildings across the state under terms of a bill the Kansas House sent to Gov. Mike Hayden Monday.

On a vote of 84-41, the House accepted a change the Senate made in the bill that prescribes a $20 fine for anyone caught smoking in a non-smoking zone. Hayden has said he is inclined to sign the measure and if he does, it would go into effect July 1.

During a news conference after the bill first cleared the House last month, Hayden said he believes there's little doubt that second-hand smoke is hazardous to non-smokers and tobacco often serves as "a gateway" to the use of hard drugs.

State law already prohibits smoking in elevators, theaters, libraries, museums, waiting rooms of doctors' offices and in many governmental meeting rooms.

Tax increase may yield benefits

TOPEKA — The chairman of the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee acknowledged Monday that a state tax reform plan he helped draft would mean a tax increase for some Kansas income taxpayers, but said they are the ones who benefit the most from last year's federal tax reform.

"Yes, there are some people who have to pay more (under the proposed state tax changes)," said Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, who with Rep. Ed Rolfs, R-Junction City, is sponsoring the state reform plan.

"There has to be (some tax increases) when we take some 60,000 people off the tax rolls and we exempt Social Security income (from state taxation)," added Kerr, as he opened hearings before his committee on the Tax Equity and Simplification Act, which passed the House on March 27.

"But the people who pay the higher state taxes get a substantial reduction at the federal level."

Meese denies he blocked probe

WASHINGTON — Attorney General Edwin Meese III denied on Monday that he blocked an investigation into alleged gun-running to the Nicaraguan Contras last year when Congress was preparing to debate resumption of aid to the rebels.

Meese, speaking at a news conference, also rejected suggestions that then-National Security Adviser John Poindexter had urged him to shelve the investigation.

He acknowledged, however, that he had kept abreast of the probe, discussing it with the U.S. attorney in Miami, Leon Kellner.

Meese's handling of the investigation is one of several matters relating to the Iran-Contra affair in which the Justice Department's activities are coming under increasing scrutiny.

Later this week, the Senate Intelligence Committee is expected to ask FBI Director William Webster about Meese's not calling the FBI into the affair until last Nov. 26, the day after the attorney general declared that money from secret arms shipments to Iran had been diverted to the Contras.

Evidence collected later by the independent counsel investigating the affair suggested that there was extensive destruction of documents by National Security Council staffers in the days preceding the FBI's entry into the case.

Reagan asks for pension insurance

WASHINGTON — The Reagan administration asked Congress on Monday to make ailing Rust Belt industries who raid their pension funds pay annual premiums of up to $150 per worker to insure monthly benefits for millions of current and future retirees.

The legislation would continue the current $8.50 flat annual premium charged by the Pension Benefit Guarantee Corp. for insuring each of 20 million workers belonging to the 100,000 financially healthy single-employer pension plans in the country.

But corporate sponsors of 10,000 other pension plans with insufficient assets for fulfilling retirement income promises to approximately 10 million workers would have to pay additional, risk-based premiums for the government insurance.

AIDS children face hidden barriers

PHILADELPHIA — The estimated 3,000 children who will have AIDS by 1991 face an "invisible barrier" to social and public health services as well as abandonment by their own families, Surgeon General C. Everett Koop said Monday.

In a speech opening a three-day conference on AIDS in children, Koop criticized those who he said would deny the growing number of children with AIDS "a normal and dignified life."

As of last week, there were 471 cases of AIDS reported among children under 13, Koop said. As many as 2,000 other children are reported to have symptoms of the infection, but are not counted because their conditions don't fit narrow federal guidelines, he added.

The Public Health Service estimates that 3,000 children will have the disease by 1991 "and virtually all will die," Koop said.

Because of the stigma of AIDS, children with the disease have fewer foster homes available to them and also "suffer abandonment by the mother and society," Koop said.

"In fact, the stigma has been an invisible but impenetrable barrier between them and a whole variety of social and public health services," Koop said.

AIDS children "must be nurtured, helped to grow and develop, allowed to interact with peers, attend school and encouraged to participate in all activities of childhood despite shortened lives," he said.

House recommends changes to pari-mutuel betting bill

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Senate subcommittee began its work Monday on a House-passed bill that would implement pari-mutuel wagering on dog and horse racing in Kansas.

The subcommittee recommended several changes in the bill, including one that would require developers who apply for a track license to put down as much as $500,000 up front. They also recommended restricting the use of live animals in the training of racing dogs.

The panel will meet today to finish its work. Its recommendations will be forwarded to the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee.

The chairman of the full committee, Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth, has said he wants his panel to consider the bill early this week so that the Senate can debate it before first adjournment, now scheduled for Saturday.

"We've got to get this out of the Senate this week," said Sen. Ben Vidricksen, R-Salina and chairman of the subcommittee.

The committee recommended changes that would:

—Require developers who want to build a track with a racing season of more than 150 days a year to put up $500,000. To build a track with a season of 150 days or less, a developer would have to put up $250,000.

—Force developers to show proof they have the financing to build a track within 30 days after they apply for a license.

—Allow the racing commission to set regulations for the use of drugs on racing animals.

—Ban the use of live animals in the training of racing dogs or during races at licensed tracks. However, the provision would not prevent the use of live lures off a track's premises.

money (senators) control, we need greater input from different sectors of the student population," she said. "I don't feel like we're getting that now."

Traeger said because of that belief, she sponsored a new bill, passed at Senate's March 26 meeting, that would establish an ad hoc committee to study ways of bringing more diversity to representation.

"We know there are different living situations which lend themselves to different perspectives," Traeger said, "and I think it's that perspective that we need in the decision-making process in the Senate."

Once the shortcomings of representation have been identified, another problem is getting people involved in student government, she said.

Traeger used the election of graduate senators as an example of students' lack of interest in student government.

The 1986-87 Senate amended the Student Governing Association Constitution so one senator represents 300 full-time and 600 part-time students. Previously, each senator represented 300 full-time students.

The number of graduate senator seats increased from four to six. Two students declared candidacy but were not included on the ballot because they failed to turn in expenditure reports. Consequently, all seats were won by write-in candidates.

"The point is some (graduate school senators) had write-in votes which allowed them to be a student senator with, say, no more than 10 votes," she said.

Among other issues Traeger addressed were the non-revenue sports scholarship fee and the institutional support fee.

Traeger said the non-revenue sports scholarship fee might not have passed as a student referendum because it was aimed at helping the wrong sports.

"I would have rather seen a fee that would have directly benefited the sports that can help the whole program, and those are revenue sports," she said. Revenue sports are men's basketball and football.

"What we found was that football and (men's) basketball carry all the other non-revenue sports — they have to," Traeger said. "If they don't, that's where we get into situations like we have."

Traeger said she had intended to bring up some sort of legislation in Senate but not after the defeat of the athletic fee.

However, voters had not solved any problems through the defeat of the fee, she said.

Expanding the "I Contribute a Twenty" program into a student-organized booster club that members wouldn't necessarily have to give $20 to join is one step Traeger said she would like to see taken.

Sally Traeger

"Eight cheerleaders don't necessarily cut it. You need a student body that (is) supportive of those programs," she said.

"If we can spark something through student leadership just by students that are concerned about where the direction (of K-State athletics) is going, then I believe we will be able to solve our problems in the long run, without a fee."

In February, a 10-member student advisory board was selected for ICAT, she said.

As for the institutional support fee, Traeger said the University administration and the agencies being assessed the fee established this semester need to come to terms with what is expected on both sides.

"From a business standpoint, we have to have the understanding that there is no free lunch, but there has to be a granted level of understanding and clarification of expectations," Traeger said.

The fee would levy a 3 percent tax on the income of seven campus agencies and auxilary accounts for goods and services the University supplies.

Traeger said the best proposal would allow two things: A fair distribution of services and funds paid between both groups, and good relations between the administration and the agencies.

Overall, student government did "cleanup work" during her term, Traeger said. The 1986-87 Senate passed standing rules on how to conduct business. Previously, Senate had followed Robert's Rules of Order and relied on past traditions.

"We want Senate to be an effective means of addressing student concerns," Traeger said, "and you have to be able to do that with a group that is well-organized."

Traeger said one piece of advice she would leave for her successor Benoit is to try to keep a sense of humor to help senators realize they are not on a pedestal.

"(Senate is) not an omnipotent group," she said.

Johnson

results if it had been voted down in a referendum.

"If it would have been voted down, then would the issue have been dead?" Johnson said. The referendum might have failed if students didn't want the specific changes proposed, even though they might have wanted other changes, he said.

Johnson sponsored a bill establishing a committee to examine Senate representation. It passed at Senate's March 16 meeting.

People in key positions on the committee will have to be objective to handle the position wisely, Johnson said. Input from senators who dealt with the issue last year could be good, but it should not be a dominating influence.

The diversity of off-campus students presents special problems in deciding how those students are represented, he said.

Another issue that arose during Johnson's administration was the institutional support fee. The fee will levy a 3 percent tax on the income of seven local agencies and auxiliary accounts.

Johnson said he was against such a fee on a permanent basis, but he was not totally adverse to paying this year.

Since Gov. Mike Hayden announced the 3.8 percent state budget cut for K-State and other government institutions, it has been hard for the University to cut back, he said.

However, it is also hard for the targeted agencies and accounts to find an additional 3 percent to give out of their income, Johnson said.

"Each of the entities was established as auxiliary services for the students," he said. The Union, one of the agencies targeted by the fee, is a good example of this because it serves as a hospitality center for students, Johnson said.

Another controversy surrounding Johnson's term was his loss of the chairmanship on the Student Advisory Committee to the Kansas Board of Regents.

"The whole attitude when we got together was people wanted to see something happen with SAC," Johnson said. However, what each representative on the committee wanted to accomplish was different.

Johnson said he felt there had been a great deal of talking behind his back and that was "bringing out petty jealousies" on the part of some members of SAC.

"It was obvious (that) if they held that attitude, I wouldn't be able to take the group anywhere," he said. Last year, a decision was made at a meeting in Hays to replace him as president of the committee.

Although he stepped down from the chairmanship, "I felt I had the capabilities to hold that position," Johnson said.

"I was determined that even though there would be hard feelings on my side, I wouldn't let that stand in the way of whoever was the chair," he said.

Steven Johnson

Other issues Johnson addressed during his term were the non-revenue sports scholarship fee, relations with the Board of Regents and a freshman orientation program.

Concerning the non-revenue sports scholarship fee, Johnson said he liked the way it was presented, but after talking to different groups he thought it might be a burden to some.

The fee referendum failed during Student Governing Association general elections in February.

"I personally would not have had a problem with a flat-out fee to the athletic department," Johnson said. "If we give them the money, I trust that the people we have there will spend it where they need it the most."

However, Johnson said he spent a lot of time talking to other groups about the fee.

"I spent a lot of time talking to people at the (KSU) Child Care Cooperative," he said. "Some of those people were working to make financial ends meet. The total dollar figure starts to make a difference."

Johnson said his relationship with the Board of Regents had been good, and students can wield some influence in Topeka.

"It takes making your presence known," he said. "Getting a number of students down there (in Topeka) to talk to the legislators and say, 'Hey, we're here.'"

Johnson said he would have liked to do more work with the University's freshman orientation program, one of the shorter ones in the state.

Research work had been done on other universities' programs to see if K-State's could be improved, he said.

Having one of the shortest in the state could be a plus, though, Johnson said. Parents can come to the program and still not have to take off too much time from work.

Tide of mediocrity swelling at K-State

The voices are getting louder. They can be heard in the Union, Farrell Library or a lounge in the dorms — conversations tinged with frustration and anger. They can be "heard" on the pages of the Collegian, especially in letters to the editor.

It has been a slow process, but the crying out of students and faculty has begun. Dissatisfaction laced with disappointment spells indignation in my book and there are a lot of indignant students and faculty members at K-State. And the voices just get louder.

The words of this column may be labeled by some as dissent, by others as a quest for excellence and still others might call it a good, old-fashioned gripe. Call it what you may, but it is perhaps best identified as an open letter to President Jon Wefald and all the administrators of K-State.

The frustrated and dissatisfied voices I have been hearing are not the result of my classes scrambling my brains. The voices are from real students and real faculty members with very real complaints about the quality of education at K-State. I do not know to what extent the administrators of this University are aware of this slowly brewing pot of trouble, but I sincerely hope they heed these words.

PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Columnist

As a journalist and as a student who has many interests where education is concerned, I have found myself talking to quite a wide range of students, faculty and staff in my almost two years of graduate school at K-State. In these conversations, I have heard one dominant theme over and over: Quality education at K-State is a dying species.

In addition to these conversations, I have seen one too many letters to the editor come into the Collegian newsroom which, in one form or another, are all but begging the powers that be at K-State to give them a better education. There is the pleading for a good, scholarly library in one letter, a de-emphasis on sports and a re-emphasis on better teaching aids and facilities in another letter. There are students asking for more classes with more variety. There are letters that question how students' and taxpayers' money is spent and accurate citings of misuse of that money.

I was recently told by what we refer to in journalism as "an informed source" that one of our deans has written more recommendations this semester for professors seeking jobs elsewhere than for the entire 10-year period this person has been a dean. If it is indeed true that a substantial number of K-State professors are looking for jobs elsewhere, then this University is definitely doing something wrong.

I am sure there are varied reasons for a professor to want to teach elsewhere, but I would guess salaries have a fair stake in reasons for not wanting to teach here. I was shocked to discover the seemingly low salaries paid to professors who I would consider as deserving much more due to their heavy teaching, research and departmental responsibilities.

Then there are stories such as the one I recently was told by a fellow graduate student. She said she knew of many courses here where a class of students could very easily go through two or three instructors in one semester, with graduate assistants often filling the vacancies — with or without the necessary skills and knowledge to teach the course.

Though I have not personally witnessed last-ditch attempts to keep a course going, I have nonetheless heard this particular testimony from other students. The questioning of this type of situation does not necessarily lie with the abilities of the graduate assistant, but rather with the principle of the matter: Are we getting what we paid for?

Another sore spot with many students — both on the pro and con side — is this dumping of huge amounts of money into sports and sports facilities when K-State is so lacking in adequate, quality educational facilities. I am just not convinced K-State sports actually attract enough students to warrant the ungodly amounts of money spent on the sports program.

There is the argument that having an expensively grand sports program will attract the stars of college athletics to K-State who will in turn make the University famous, which will in turn bring in more students and thus more money for all those starving educational projects. I cannot speak for other students, but I refuse to pay my hard-earned money to a school that puts a few athletes up on a pedestal and worships their dribbling ability with total disregard for the fact there are students at this University who cannot read or write at a high school level.

To all the administrators of this University, I hope you realize that the signs are indicative of a not-so-bright future for the quality of education transpiring in these hallowed halls.

Perhaps you do not hear the voices in your administrative ivory towers, but you must believe students and instructors want very much to be able to get as well as give true, quality education. K-State has so much potential, but its priorities have run amok.

Elderly offer valuable perspective on history

Who is better qualified to teach history than those who have lived it?

Senior citizens have always been a wealth of information about personal family histories, but a new program being promoted through the student gerontology club and the Riley County Retired Senior Volunteers Program will allow grade school and high school students to receive an academic viewpoint from several senior volunteers.

Too often, social studies and history instructors land in a rut presenting the same material year after year.

They expect high-spirited youngsters to sit through their dry, chronological rendition of history and somehow absorb it all.

The fact is, as many who have had teachers like these can attest, uninterested students put into short-term memory only what they are certain is required to pass the tests and no more.

From boring lectures devoid of personal anecdotes students arrive at no clear understanding of history except that they dislike it.

This travesty need not be occurring when we have the resources to make history come alive and interest children and teenagers, whom we often give up on in despair, convinced they will never learn anything.

By bringing interesting, knowledgable speakers who are themselves experts on history, there is a chance an appreciation for history will be reborn.

It will take longer to see if the children's and teens' exposure to older adults will have other benefits.

But, since it is often bemoaned that in America's mobile society children lose sight of their heritage because of so little contact with their own grandparents, it is reasonable to hope the children will benefit from the special contact only older adults can provide.

Senate bill multiplies teen pregnancy fears

The Senate passed and returned to the House last Tuesday a bill which requires pregnant girls under the age of 16 to have written consent from their parents or a district judge before they can obtain an abortion.

The proposal of the parental consent amendment bill which makes it a crime to encourage children to run away from home or to hide runaway children was proposed by Sen. Frank Gaines, D-Augusta. The reasons behind this move were that no other medical procedure is performed on children without written consent of their parents or guardians.

The Senate seems to be overlooking the very real problem of teen-age pregnancy. Forcing teens to have parental consent before having an abortion is not going to deter teens from sex. It will, however, deter them from seeking safe, legal abortion procedures.

This amendment will open the doors to unsafe, unhealthy and illegal abortion clinics that will perform abortions on young teens without permission. The legal clinics need to have the opportunity to perform the abortions in a safe way without the extra worry of parental permission.

Although abortions are not to be considered a means of birth control, this new permission rule will not be considered one either. The problem is in sex education and the availability of birth control for teens younger than 16 years old. The fact is that there are teens younger than 16 who are already sexually active, with or without their parent's permission.

The fear and panic that must go through the mind of a young girl when she discovers she is pregnant can put off the decision of having an abortion too long to safely have one under normal circumstances. The requirement of having parental permission may put the decision off even longer.

This mandate needs to be taken back and re-evaluated. The general concept may have a good goal on the surface but digging further down, te fact that teens have sex has not been detered by the threat of disease or the increased awareness of contraceptives. The permission of parents should not be necessary for someone to have an abortion. In the long run, scared teens may resort to very hazardous practices to avoid parental permission. Some of these practices could lead to permanant injury to the pregnant teen-ager.

Kansas boy gone bad

Dole ignoring state's interests

Kansans have been singing the praises of Sen. Bob Dole for quite some time now — the Kansas boy who climbed out of the prairie and all the way up to Capitol Hill. He fought obscurity and a disability he received during World War II to become the most powerful man in the U.S. Senate. This is the kind of stuff good novels are made of.

And now Dole is running for president, unofficially at least. Actually, he has been running for president since he was Gerald Ford's running mate in 1976. After Ford's defeat, Dole set out on his own and seems to have his act together for '88. With George Bush sinking rapidly into the quagmire of the Iran-Contra scandal, Dole looks to have the Republican nomination all wrapped up.

But while Kansans are rejoicing the success of their hometown boy, I think it is important to examine just what Dole has done for Kansas. Just because someone is from Kansas doesn't mean he is good for Kansas. I know a few Kansans I wouldn't trust as dogcatchers, much less U.S. Senators.

In the last 10 years, Dole has transformed from a decent voice of the people into a shifty, two-faced, political hack. These are mighty harsh words for such a popular figure, but then Darth Vader is also a popular figure. It is time we start judging Dole by his content and not his cover.

The thing that really gets to me is the fact that Dole, who is supposed to be representing the people of Kansas, is continually turning his back on his constituents. He seems to always take sides with the Reagan administration, regardless of what Kansans want. One example of this was the South Africa sanctions issue. When the president vetoed this legislation, Dole lead the fight to sustain the veto even though the people of Kansas overwelmingly supported the sanctions. So much for the voice of the people.

Another issue in which Dole has completely snubbed the will of the people of Kansas is the whole Contra aid mess. Polls taken for the last two years have shown that two-thirds (and sometimes more) of the people don't want aid to the Contras. Dole has been very close-minded on this issue, choosing to be Reagan's cheerleader instead. Even with intense public pressure, Dole still voted to waste another $100 million to fund a corrupt group of terrorists. This $100 million could have gone just as easily to education if it weren't for Dole's incompetent representation.

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

This has been a common practice with Dole. He regularly aligns himself with whatever powerful interests can help him at the time. Big business and wealthy conservative causes are among his favorite groups, along with the political action committees that supplied him with tens of thousands of dollars for his re-election campaign. Why would any group give money to a candidate who is literally a shoe-in to win, unless it is to gain later favors? Dole didn't need to spend one nickel to win against his opponent Guy MacDonald, who only spent a few thousand dollars and was virtually unknown. This crossed the line separating legitimate campaign financing and out-and-out bribery.

Dole also has an ally in the White House. He has stood by Reagan's side many times, up until the Iran-Contra scandal. When this story broke, Dole cautiously distanced himself from the Reagan administration. The scandal had already eaten Bush and Dole wasn't about to stick his neck out. This left Dole in the lead for the high office.

But the senator didn't stay away from Reagan for long. Just last week, Dole became the president's voice in the Senate when he led the charge to sustain the veto of the highway bill. Dole tried to stall a final vote on the bill that gives states money for roads and also raises the speed limit to 65 mph on rural interstates, something Kansas has plenty of. He failed and the veto was overridden.

The highway bill is a popular issue in Kansas. So popular, in fact, that the Kansas Legislature didn't waste any time passing corresponding state laws the very same night. Even Gov. Mike Hayden got into the act, waiting in the Statehouse to sign the bills as soon as the Legislature passed them. Now tell me why Dole was trying to kill this bill?

We all know that Dole is a powerful man who is now shooting for the top. He might even make a good president. But I hope he pays more attention to the people who elect him than he does now. If Reagan wants a senator to represent him, let him apply for statehood. Kansas wants its senator back.

Office to oversee academic records

By JEFF BIELSER
Staff Writer

A government mandate for universities to monitor the progress of their students receiving financial aid has resulted in two systems of measurement at K-State.

Qualitative and quantitative systems of measuring academic progress have been devised and are now or will be used beginning next fall, said Lorene Dahm, administrative officer I.

Measuring academic progress, for students receiving financial aid, begins when students receive their first assistance, she said.

The quantitative way of measuring students' progress is being used now, Dahm said. It uses the number of hours upon which the financial aid was awarded compared to the number of hours students complete during a semester to determine satisfactory academic progress.

Beginning in the fall of 1987, the registrar's office will begin keeping track of students' grade point averages as well, she said.

In order for students to continue receiving financial aid they must maintain a 2.0 GPA after 60 credit hours of work, Dahm said. This will mainly affect freshmen entering K-State next fall, and they will not feel the effect of maintaining the necessary grades until 1989.

"What the University has is what the government mandates," she said.

The Office of Student Financial Assistance is using the quantitative system already, but it has also been improved, Dahm said.

With improvements in the system, students who complete more hours than the hours upon which they were awarded financial aid are credited with the additional hours, Dahm said.

This means if students are awarded financial aid based on 12 credit hours and they complete 18 credit hours they would be credited with the six additional hours, she said. Twelve hours is the minimum number of hours required to be awarded financial aid on a full-time basis.

During a later semester, if students only complete nine hours when financial aid was awarded on 12 hours, then three hours of the six credited hours would be used, but they would still have three hours to their credit, Dahm said.

Hours not counted as being completed include those that are failed, dropped or withdrawn from, she said. The hours are counted after grades have been posted for the semester.

With the old system of counting, those six credited hours could not have been applied if a deficit occurred after they were accrued, Dahm said. Students would have to complete more hours than the hours financial aid was awarded for to erase the deficit the following semester.

Students who find themselves in a deficit of hours completed vs. hours on which financial aid was awarded will be placed on financial aid warning for one term, she said.

After one term, their academic progress will be measured again and if the deficit has increased or not been removed they are placed on financial aid exclusion, Dahm said.

An appeal process is available for students who don't think they should have been put on financial aid exclusion, Dahm said.

The appeals are made in writing and should indicate the circumstances behind the appeal, according to a pamphlet provided by Dahm.

Students give their own reasons why they should not be on exclusion, then their advisers must also fill out the form telling why the students should not be excluded from financial aid, Dahm said.

According to the pamphlet, the student's adviser must state that a conference has been held with the student to discuss the academic deficiency and what steps will be taken to correct it.

Students' appeals are reviewed and they are notified of the action taken; either the appeal has been denied or approved, according to the pamphlet. If the students' appeals are approved, their financial aid will be reinstated based on availability of funds.

"If they are really serious about their deficiencies, it is a good possibility for approval of an appeal," Dahm said.

For students on exclusion, there are "numerous ways to get out of it," Dahm said.

"They have (to) complete more hours than what financial aid was based on," she said. Intersession is a good place for this as there is no financial aid awarded during this period, so all hours completed then could be counted toward a deficiency.

Summer school is another avenue if students don't receive any kind of financial aid during that term as well, Dahm said.

Another way students can get off financial aid exclusion is by paying back the financial aid they received, she said.

Figures misleading

Value of aid search in doubt

Editor's Note: Today is the second day in a five-part series about financial aid. Beginning today is the first installment about student matching services.

By DERON JOHNSON
Editorial Page Editor

Perhaps it was inevitable: The escalating costs of obtaining an education, combined with the diminishing pools of money to fund that education, have created a niche for entrepreneurs offering financial aid search services.

And, considering how the companies are flourishing, students eager to locate new sources of money are willing to spend an average of $50 to receive a list of the "untapped sources" of money just waiting for them, regardless, the companies say, of past academic success or parental income.

Because the amount of unclaimed financial aid dollars seems too good to be true, some people believe it is. The California Student Aid Commission conducted a survey in 1982 involving the scholarship search services and the success of their programs.

A key element of the Commission's investigation revolved around the claim by most of these companies that there are millions of dollars — perhaps as much as $150-$500 million — that go unclaimed every year. In fact, "U.S. News and World Report" has listed available aid money that goes unclaimed each year at $135 million.

The Commission found this figure to be misleading.

"The committee could find no documentation that large amounts of student aid go unused," the Commission's report stated. The report contained information about the Commission's findings and the methodology used to conduct the investigation.

The hundreds of millions of financial aid dollars may actually be unused employee tuition benefits, the Commission found. Such benefits are not considered for the general public.

"The National Commission on Student Financial Assistance recently estimated that 'about $7 billion is available annually from the private sector for tuition assistance, but less than $400 million is actually used each year,'" the report stated.

However, it continued, "This is assistance that can only be used by persons employed by companies that offer tuition assistance programs and can only be obtained under conditions set forth by the employers.

"Such assistance is not available to the general public."

The Commission relied on 15 Los Angeles high school seniors culled from three Los Angeles high schools. The Commission chose students who would be most eligible for scholarship dollars, using criteria such as ethnicity, religious preference, parents' income, college major, grade point average, special skills, talents, organizations to which their parents belonged (including military) and the sex of the student.

Despite the disputed figure of unused financial aid money, the effectiveness of such companies is something currently open to debate. Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, said students should beware of the companies and the riches they promise.

"There probably are some legitimate (companies) out there," he said. "But there are some out there taking money from students in large chunks."

He said some search services charge up to $700 for their information. Usually, the services guarantee at least five matches for students who fill out a questionnaire detailing their interests and abilities. Some students may receive as many as 25, according to the companies. Using the questionnaire as a guide, students are "matched" with the funds available through a computer data base.

However, Viterna said the five sources promised may be things like Guaranteed Student Loans, National Direct Student Loans and Pell Grants — sources of financial aid already readily available through high school counselors or university financial aid officers. Viterna said about 90 percent of the information offered by the matching services can be found in a high school or university financial aid office.

Currently, there are about 50 computerized search companies nationwide.

One of the data base sources for the 50 is Academic Guidance Services, located in Marlton, N.J. Ken Reynolds, assistant to the vice president, said the 4,500 sources of money provided by the company are the most offered by any one data base.

"We have the largest data base in the world," Reynolds said.

He said the company sub-contracts to other companies across the nation and 40,000 students received aid matches last year.

The company guarantees at least five private sources of aid, including corporation and foundation sources. Government sources are not considered among the five promised, he said.

The company uses from 15-20 criteria to match students with financial aid. Some of those he cited are career goals, paternal organizations and labor union affiliations. He said the individual companies set the prices for their services.

"What they charge is up to them," he said.

Although he said about 50 percent of the students ultimately receive money, the company's success is not based on that measure.

"Our success is based on the number of sources we can provide," Reynolds said. The sources in the data base are updated daily and the files are "purged" every six months, he said.

However, "from time to time a source will go out of business" before students can take advantage of its money. But that occurs rarely, he said.

One of AGS' member companies is College Scholarship Sources, located in Olathe. Sharon Pellow, owner of the two-month-old company, said she decided to found the company after an arduous, unsuccessful search for financial aid for her high-school age daughter.

"I am my own company and I set my own fee," she said. "So far, I've just had a real minimal response."

She said she has processed three student forms.

She chose to contract with AGS, she said, because "they have an exceptionally excellent reputation."

She charges $49 for undergraduate students and $69 for graduate students. While she guarantees at least five sources for undergraduates, she guarantees only one for graduate students.

"The graduate student usually has a job and can afford to pay a little more," she said in justifying the extra $20 graduate students must pay.

Donald Hills, research manager for the California Student Aid Commission, said that based on the Commission's study, he doesn't recommend the services for students.

"They aren't effective," he said. "We didn't think in most cases it was worth the money spent by the student."

Although there are some exceptions that do benefit students, the majority — by design — simply can't be effective, he said.

"It sounds like a good idea, but it is probably technically difficult to do for large numbers of people," Hills said. "The scholarship search organizations usually don't pick up the specific things students are eligible for."

For instance, he said the forms don't ask for particular church organizations or specific branches of the military.

"We didn't find one (company) that we thought did the job because they can't possible ask specific enough questions," he said.

For instance, he said a student whose father belonged to a union would receive advice to ask that union about possible scholarships instead of receiving a list of specific scholarships offered by the union.

"In a lot of cases, (the search organizations) didn't identify the simple things students are eligible for," he said.

He said if a student is truly serious about receiving a list of aid sources, that student should sit down with a consultant and spend a good deal of time going over specific things. Only then, Hills said, could the student hope to receive as detailed a list of aid sources as the search companies promise.

First manager finalist vows quality service

By The Collegian Staff

If he becomes the next general manager of physical facilities at K-State, Byron Walker said he will approach the position with a "customer-oriented" attitude, referring to students.

Walker, the first of four finalists for the position, toured campus Monday and spoke with University officials.

"I'm interested in providing a quality service to clients (the students)," Walker said. "I was favorably impressed with the campus and with the vitality of the students."

Walker said he uses several management techniques as facilities manager, facilities planning supervisor and construction management engineer for Solar Energy Research Institute in Golden, Colo., where he has worked since 1980.

Depending on the particular situation, Walker said he might use management by past results. "If it works once, I'll try it again," he said.

Another philosophy he has is "if it ain't broke, don't fix it."

Walker stressed his style of management and how he sets and attains his goals through a centralized policy-making process and de-centralized execution, utilizing the resources of the people who work under him.

He said he will work to eliminate barriers that prevent the work force from applying their individual resources.

For his philosophy to work, "all the people need to keep their oars in the water in synchronicity."

The general manager of physical facilities on campus is responsible for the maintenance and operation of all campus facilities.

Kenneth Rott, a second finalist for the position, will be on campus Wednesday. He will have an open interview session at 9:45 a.m. in Union 207.

Rott has been director of physical facilities at Ball State University, Muncie, Ind., since 1976.

The other two finalists will visit the campus next week.

Ronald R. Blickhahn, assistant vice president for facilities planning and management at Old Dominion University in Norfolk, Va., will have an open interview session from 9:45 a.m. to 10:45 a.m. on Monday, April 13.

Edward Rice, director of the physical plant at Montana State University, Bozeman, Mont., will conduct an open interview session from 9:45 a.m. to 10:45 a.m. on Wednesday, April 15.

Female education differs, speaker says

By The Collegian Staff

Adolescent black girls are not being given the educational background to make occupational choices, said Carol Carter, associate professor at Northeast University in Boston.

Carter spoke Monday in the K-State Union Little Theatre in conjunction with an institute for the U.S. Women's Educational Equity Act program.

Carter said a key factor in black girls' academic and intellectual development is the view that they are socially competent, rather than intellectually competent.

Carter said a 1984 ethnographic study by Linda Grant of first graders in a desegregated classroom showed teachers perceived black females as socially mature, but regarded white females as academically competent.

A 1983 study shows black girls either dropped out of high school or graduated because of the way teachers regarded them in the classrooms, not because of academics, she said.

Socialization of the black girl in the family and what they are taught to appreciate can contribute to some of black girls' educational and occupational problems, Carter said.

In the primarily egalitarian black family, everyone participates in decision making, she said. Black girls are taught to be independent, resourceful and responsibile.

Much of that is not part of the traditional concept of a girl entering school, Carter said.

"The white female role is to be quiet, submissive (and) organized in a neat kind of way as far as the teacher is concerned," she said.

Studies show females are more influenced by socioeconomic status when making career decisions.

Black females exhibit high aspirations for certain careers, but the gap occurs between bringing together the actual preparation for the career and the aspiration for that career, she said.

The teacher can set the black girl on the right career path by bridging the gap with appropriate course study, Carter said.

Seminars encourage 'quality' parenting

By RITA GRAVES
Collegian Reporter

In today's fast-paced society, parents sometimes find it difficult to spend quality time with their children. The parent involvement seminar concluding today is trying to correct that.

The seminar is targeted at professionals interested in establishing workshops to help parents become involved in their child's life, said Jenny Oliver, coordinator of off-campus programming for the College of Education.

Because some parents have so little time to spend with their children, the overall goal of the seminar is to try and train parents to do their job as effectively and efficiently as possible, said Leanne Beets, Parent Involvement Program Coordinator for U.S.D. 321 in St. Marys.

"Some parents spend as little as 14 minutes a day with their children," Beets said.

"Schools are realizing they can't do the whole job by themselves, so they are asking parents to get involved with their children in the home," she said.

The seminar will provide knowledge and insight to effectively develop positive parenting styles in the seminar participants and in parents with whom they work, Oliver said. In addition, the seminar will provide techniques and materials needed to train and help parents.

The two-day seminar is designed for professionals such as teachers, counselors, psychologists, PTA leaders, child care workers, social workers and church leaders, she said.

Teaching parents to become involved with their children can have a positive effect on how well a child does in school and the child's ability to grow and become a positive member in society, Oliver said.

Some of the seminar's benefits are learning how to start parent support groups, obtaining current information and materials to develop skills to teach parents, discovering how other professionals are successfully working with parents and learning the secrets of involving parents in their child's life, Oliver said.

"Our goal is to teach parents exactly what to expect from their children," Beets said.

The seminar for the parent involvement program focuses on four major topics.

"Being a Parent" focuses on updated child-rearing techniques that reflect the changing lifestyles of the 1980s.

"School Days" stresses the vital link between the home setting and the educational environment. The program helps parents become aware of their role and expectations toward the child's education.

"The Art of Communication" provides techniques and approaches to help parents build bridges of communication with their children. Techniques to learn include delivering sensitive information, solving problems and effective listening.

"Child Management" provides techniques that reinforce appropriate behavior and modify inappropriate behavior.

Dylan Welsh, Norfolk, Neb., watches out for the enemy on a cold morning near Pea Ridge, Ark.

Confederate troops Roger White, Michael Welsh and Greg Traxson break camp and load their equipment into a modern-day supply wagon.

With guns blazing, Confederate troops chase Union soldiers across the valley separating the two camps. The groups battled in the valley, on the hillsides and in heavy timber during the three-day re-enactment. The Union troops are members of a Coffeyville Community College history class, while the rebel force comprises former class members.

Thursday, April 2.

4:30 p.m. — Company A 11th Arkansas Volunteers, after making a few last-minute stops, got under way. The men were laughing and singing and full of excitement. Not knowing that three days later they will return on the same road, quiet and tired, and the only sounds will be an occasional sigh or a low, murmured remembrance of a recently lived event followed by a few quiet chuckles.

9 p.m. — We finally reached home, (near Coffeyville) ate supper, watched some TV and then hit the sack.

Six K-State students and five of their friends left the safety and comfort of their homes Thursday and donned the roles of Confederate troops for a Civil War battle re-enactment in Pea Ridge, Ark.

The original Battle of Pea Ridge was fought March 7 and 8 in 1862. This, the largest battle fought this side of the Mississippi River, was to determine the control of Missouri, said Greg Traxson, senior in history and leader of the Confederate group.

A history class from Coffeyville Community College made up the Union troops. Traxson had taken the class two years ago and has taken part in the re-enactment ever since. The class introduces students to life as a Civil War soldier.

Friday, April 3.

6 a.m. — Began rousting the troops and by 8 a.m. everybody was in uniform, had eaten breakfast and was raring to go.

12:15 p.m. — After quite a few stops and even some mechanical trouble, we reached Pea Ridge. Shortly thereafter I experienced my proudest moment. Undetected by the Union Army (Company C 3rd Kansas Volunteers), we formed columns of two just over a small hill. Although the men didn't have a clue as to what I was wanting to do, they performed beautifully. The surprise was ours and very impressive. The Union commander complimented me on our professionalism and technique.

The rest of the afternoon was spent setting up camp and cooking a supper of fried potatoes and onions, and hardtack (unleavened bread usually made in hard, large wafers; it is traditionally part of Army and Navy rations.)

Dusk — Rebel forces walked into a Yankee patrol, the sides exchanged fire and the Union forces fell back.

8-10:30 — Harassment of pickets (watch guards).

Through the darkness, the pickets tried to make out the form of an enemy soldier. Yelling things such as "Hey, Reb" was returned with "What do you want, Yank?" and other taunts. The taunting was successful in wearing down the nerves of the soldiers, causing tempers to flare into occasional outbursts of profanity or gunfire. Sitting in the dark, it becomes a mind game to try and stay calm while straining into the blackness for any enemy movement.

Being on a picket could make 10 minutes seem like hours, never knowing if the rustle of the leaves or snap of a twig was the enemy or an animal.

Saturday, April 4.

6 a.m. — Camp begins to stir and the men gather at the fires. The temperature reached 15 degrees last night but the men are in good spirits. After a breakfast of eggs, potatoes, salt pork, coffee and the last of the hardtack, we made several assaults on the Union camp. Returning to camp, I placed pickets on the ridge and waited for the Union to attack.

11:30 a.m. — After a brief Union attack ½ of the rebels returned to camp and the other ½ joined the Union army on a march to the park (Pea Ridge National Military Park).

12:30 p.m. — Returned and the men relaxed with a lunch of chicken and cornbread.

During the rest of the day several battles were fought using black-powder guns, and 12-gauge shotguns and 22-caliber rifles loaded with blanks. The battles were fought true to the form used in the Civil War, with each side forming skirmish lines and firing at each other.

5:30-8 p.m. — Supper with the Union. Everybody had a real enjoyable time. Showed weapons to each other, told stories, just after dark we left the camp and made repeated assaults on defenses. One (Confederate) soldier managed to capture the (Union) cavalry's (flag).

Later, the Union soldiers had tired, much to the disappointment of my men. So in retaliation, I walked into camp and took the company's "Old Glory." We returned to camp with one Union lieutenant as a prisoner and sat around the fires until early in the morning telling stories, laughing and such. The fighting was over and the men knew it. All were in good spirits, and laughing and chuckling continued even after we bedded down.

Sunday, April 5.

6:30 a.m. — I awoke and got up to find two soldiers already up. I decided to let the men sleep for awhile, then roust them. Around 7 a.m. we began to wake people up.

After good-byes were said to new friends on the Union side, the Confederate soldiers broke camp and headed home.

We hit the road and stopped briefly for some good ol' 20th century junk food and headed for home, stopping at my parent's house for a good meal and showers, which made the trip on up to Manhattan much more enjoyable. We returned around 8 p.m., bones creaking and muscles aching; we unloaded the vehicles and made plans for a get-together in the near future.

Union soldier Bill Steffes cleans his revolver in preparation for the evening's battle.

The Confederate participants were Traxson; Mike Welsh, junior in animal sciences and industry; Mark McCully, junior in engineering; Todd Dautel, junior in animal sciences and industry; Roger White, senior in agricultural education; Steve Black, senior in history; Chip Houser, Manhattan resident; Dylan Welsh, Norfolk, Neb. resident; Mike Banta, Coffeyville resident; Brad Bauer, Coffeyville resident; and Lance Linnebur, Cherryvale resident.

Greg Traxson, left, commander of the Confederate force, leads his troops into battle. The soldiers fought with black-powder revolvers and rifles.

Hagler not so Marvelous in loss to Leonard

By The Associated Press

LAS VEGAS, Nev. — Sugar Ray Leonard returned to the ring in spectacular fashion after a three-year layoff and upset Marvelous Marvin Hagler Monday night to become middleweight champion.

Leonard won the 12-round bout on a split decision to become boxing's 10th triple champion.

Leonard circled and impressed judges with flurries in the late rounds in one of the great comeback stories in boxing history, although some thought the aggressive Hagler had an edge.

Judge Lou Filippo scored it 115-113 for Hagler while judge Dave Moretti saw it 115-113 and JoJo Guerra had it 118-110, both for Leonard.

The Associated Press favored Hagler, 117-112.

"I see myself taking him out," Leonard said of a dream he had in the days before the fight. Leonard couldn't take him out, but he did what the oddsmakers gave him little chance to do.

Hagler, losing for the first time in 38 fights, dating to 1976, was a 2½-1 favorite.

"He, to me, is still the champion," the jubilant Leonard said in the ring after the fight as a sellout throng of 15,366 in an outdoor arena at Caesars Palace cheered him on.

"I didn't want the belt. I just wanted to beat him."

The only belt Leonard will get is the World Boxing Council belt. The International Boxing Federation didn't sanction the fight and will declare the title vacant. The World Boxing Association has stripped Hagler of the title.

Leonard, fighting for only the second time since his last undisputed welterweight title fight in Feb. 1982, came out circling and made Hagler miss badly in the first four rounds. Then in the fifth, Hagler landed some head shots and hurt Leonard with a left to the head.

Throughout the fight, the stalking Hagler seemed to land the harder shots. But Leonard, looking very tired from the sixth through 10th rounds, never quit fighting, landing several combinations although they seemed to lack sting.

In the 11th round, Leonard went flat-footed and outpunched Hagler with several flurries to the head, followed with a beautiful hook to the body and a hook to the head.

Throughout the fight, Hagler trapped Leonard on the ropes, only to have Leonard flurry to get free.

Both men went at it toe-to-toe in the final round and on a couple of occasions Leonard circled his hand in the air to lead cheers for himself. Hagler hurt Leonard with a left to the head, but then the bell sounded.

"I beat him," Hagler said. "I beat him, and he knows it."

"I told you about Vegas. They stole it. I stayed aggressive, and I won the fight," said Hagler who had complained about the officiating in Las Vegas.

"I made a comeback that was the greatest accomplishment of my life," Leonard said. "It was an impossible task. I prepared myself for one year, so it was a case of a young guy coming back against a young guy."

Leonard will be 31 on May 17; Hagler will be 33 on May 23.

Their ages weren't really in question. The questions coming in were whether Leonard could overcome inactivity and if Hagler had slipped badly.

Many observers felt Hagler had showed signs of slowing down during his 11th-round victory over John Mugabi on March 19, 1986 in Las Vegas.

Another question was Leonard's eyes. He had retinal surgery on the left eye in 1982 and a surgical procedure on the right in 1984.

The eyes were never a factor Monday night.

After the fight, Leonard indicated he might fight again.

"It depends on the contract," he said.

The victory gave Leonard a 34-1 record with 24 knockouts as he became the seventh welterweight or former welterweight champion to win the middleweight title. One of the first six was Leonard's namesake, Sugar Ray Robinson.

"Super Fight" spectators jubilate between rounds of the WBC middleweight championship fight between Sugar Ray Leonard and reigning champion Marvelous Marvin Hagler Monday night at Bushwackers. The favored Hagler lost to Leonard in a 12-round split decision.

Local boxing enthusiasts back Leonard

By BILL LANG
Collegian Reporter

In what was billed as the newest fight of the century Monday night, Sugar Ray Leonard upset WBC middleweight champion Marvelous Marvin Hagler in a 12-round bout.

Boxing fans paid as much as $700 for ringside seats for the main event at Caesars Palace in Las Vegas, Nev., while local boxing fans dished out $15 for advance tickets and paid $20 at the door to see the fight on closed-circuit television at Bushwackers in Aggieville.

Fans who arrived early got the TV-side seats and enjoyed the fight as it unfolded. Others stood and watched.

While the three prefight bouts caused some irritation to some fans' anticipation, others took it in stride and sat and waited for the main event.

When the fight did take place, it was evident at first the people in the capacity crowd was evenly divided in rooting for their favorite boxer.

Some fans stood on their chairs and shouted: "Sug-ar...Sug-ar...Sug-ar," while others would stand and scream back: "This fight is Marvelous!"

As the fight unfolded it was evident the crowd had switched its taste and started rooting for the underdog Leonard.

When Leonard started landing punches the crowd would react with a deafening yell, and when Hagler landed some punches — when he was able to — the crowd reacted with an unfavorable growl of disapproval.

Of the approximate 300 viewers, many picked Leonard because of his speed and his ability to think while boxing.

"I picked Sugar all the way," said Aaron Roberson, senior in sociology. "The first round was the key round of the whole fight. If Leonard had come out and tried to bully around with Hagler it would have been a different fight. Instead he came out and set the tempo of the fight. From there, he used his brains and knew when to save his strength and when to be the showman that he is."

"I knew it would be a close fight," said Ray Kitchen, junior in sociology. "Hagler was a rock of a man and he would be hard to beat. Sugar showed how smart he was and how good he was. I was a little surprised as to how the judges called it (it was a split decision). I'm just happy that my man Sugar won."

Midway through the fight, Hagler — who went into the bout a 2½-to-1 favorite — started to mount a small comeback, and Hagler fans got back into the yelling match.

"He'll start wearing down Leonard now," said one viewer. "Here comes Hagler!"

As the fight wore on into the later rounds with Leonard clearly the winner of the fight, the chants of "Sug-ar...Sug-ar...Sug-ar," started to fly through the air from people standing on their chairs.

When the winner was announced, and Leonard had won a split decision, Leonard's fans stayed at the establishement to celebrate. Hagler's supporters, meanwhile, tried to slip quietly out the door.

'Cats to host Lady 'Hawks

Tennis team considers KU big rivalry

By The Collegian Staff

Competing against the University of Kansas isn't a season highlight for just the K-State basketball and football teams. The K-State women's tennis team also considers it a big rivalry, said K-State Coach Steve Bietau.

"We always like to play KU," Bietau said. "There's something about playing KU. People get up for them no matter what, every time."

The Wildcats, 5-6, will meet the Lady Jayhawks at 1 p.m. today at the L.P. Washburn Recreational Area.

K-State is coming off weekend losses to Oklahoma, 8-1, and Oklahoma State, 9-0 in the opening of the Big Eight Conference season. The 'Cats are 0-2 in conference play.

But Bietau said the team played well against its conference foes and he doesn't think the losses are going to hurt the squad's performance against Kansas.

"I'm looking for it to be a good match," said Bietau. K-State player Lena Svensson "played some of the best tennis of her career last weekend. One of the big matches is going to be at the No. 1 singles position between Lena and Tracy Treps."

Treps won the conference championship at the No. 1 singles spot last year and went 10-3 during the 1986 fall season. Svensson played a close match against Treps, 7-5, 7-5, in their last meeting.

As a team, the Lady Jawhawks finished second in the Big Eight last spring for the second year in a row. Last year, Kansas players won the conference championships at the No. 1 through No. 3 singles positions.

On Friday the Wildcats play at Columbia against the University of Missouri. K-State is scheduled to return home for a match Saturday with the University of Colorado at the L.P. Washburn Recreation Area.

Women's golf team trails TCU in meet

The Wildcats shot a 27-hole total of 563 after the first day of action. Texas Christian leads the tournament with a 485 and holds a narrow 1-stroke lead over Texas A&M in team standings entering the final 27 holes.

Tied for the first-day lead in the race for medalist honors were Texas A&M's Fiona Connor and North Texas State's Jackie Twamley at 117. Connor notched nine-hole rounds of 35-42-40 while Twamley fired rounds of 38-40-39.

"Shelley played real well and even had a chance to shoot in the 70s," Coach Rob Sedorcek said about K-State's performance. "Even though it was cold and windy, we just didn't play well at all as a team."

Oklahoma is third in the standings at 491. Other Big Eight Conference schools in the tournament are Iowa State (6th at 505), Kansas (7th at 507), Missouri (8th at 509) and Nebraska (13th at 545).

Baseball team to face 'best staff in state'

By The Collegian Staff

K-State's baseball team will try to get back on the winning track today against intrastate rival Fort Hays State University.

After taking it on the chin in four games over the weekend against the University of Oklahoma in Norman, the Wildcats, 12-14, are looking to collect a pair of wins over FHSU, 10-6-1, in the 2 p.m. twinbill at Frank Myers Field.

K-State was defeated by the fifth-ranked Sooners by scores of 13-6, 7-3, 11-0 and 8-7. Wildcats' Coach Mike Clark used all of his depleted pitching corps against Oklahoma, and said he would have to "piece together" a staff for the series with Fort Hays.

"We have to save some pitching for the weekend," Clark said. "We hope we can piece together two good games with five pitchers."

Clark's pitching woes are not helped by the fact that Jeff Peterson will be out of action for at least three weeks. Peterson has a cracked bone in his pitching hand, and Clark said there's a chance he may be out for the season.

Two Wildcat pitchers should return to action this week, however. Rocky Ferguson, who had calcium deposits in his elbow, will pitch against Kansas this weekend. Clark is also hoping to throw Darry Rowley, who has been recovering from a muscle strain.

Clark said the games against FHSU will not be easy ones.

Last year, K-State split a doubleheader with FHSU. The 'Cats lost the first game, 8-0, and came back to win the second, 7-6, by rallying for three runs in the bottom of the seventh.

"Year in and year out," Clark said, "Fort Hays is one of the top smaller schools. They've got really good pitching. Pro scouts say it's the best pitching staff in the state."

Clark said third baseman Jim Donahue "probably won't play today." Donahue injured an ankle over the weekend and should be ready for Kansas series.

Time for hot dogs, peanuts, baseball games

Royals fall in season opener

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — It's only one step in a long, 162-game march to October. But there is something special about being a winner on opening day.

"It was a good game for us," Manager Jim Fregosi said Monday after his Chicago White Sox started the 1987 baseball season with a 5-4 victory over the Kansas City Royals.

"We worked very hard in the spring," added Fregosi, starting his first full season as the White Sox manager. "I thought the club was really at a peak towards the end of spring training and it's good to get off to a good start this way."

Richard Dotson, drawing his first opening day assignment, outpitched Danny Jackson to gain the victory. Dotson gave up eight hits and four earned runs before requiring relief help from Bobby Thigpen in the seventh. Bob James picked up a save by getting the last out in the ninth.

"I've seen Dotson throw better this spring, but it was opening day," Fregosi said. "I thought he had good velocity and arm speed. His changeup wasn't working and that's one of his best pitches."

In other American League games, Toronto dumped Cleveland 7-3; New York slipped by Detroit, 2-1, in 10 innings; Baltimore squeaked past Texas 2-1; and Milwaukee crushed Boston 5-1.

National League games had Cincinatti dumping Montreal 11-5; San Francisco downed San Diego 4-3 and Los Angeles played at Houston in a late game.

A bright spot for the Royals was rookie first baseman Kevin Seitzer, who tripled and singled and hit a two-run double off Thigpen in the seventh.

Harold Baines and Tim Hulett hit RBI singles during Chicago's four-run second inning. Baines, who also had an RBI double, Hulett and Ozzie Guillen each had two of Chicago's eight hits.

George Brett homered for the Royals and rookie Kevin Seitzer tripled, doubled, singled and drove in two runs.

Clark picks Kansas City to claim 1987's World Series title

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

"Have a couple of beers and some nachos and you won't notice a thing."

Maybe Marvelous Marvin Hagler should have taken this advice before his fight last night with Sugar Ray Leonard.

Nevertheless, these words of wisdom came from a WHB radio announcer. He was warning those who would be in attendance at the Kansas City Royals' season-opener Monday with the Chicago White Sox in Kansas City, Mo., how to ward off afternoon chills.

In addition to the Royals, 15 other major-league baseball teams opened their 1987 campaigns Monday. The remaining 10 squads open regular-season play today.

Each season brings forth ever-popular predictions, pools and bets as to who will win the respective divisions, thus earning a trip to league playoffs and, hopefully, to the pinnacle of professional baseball — the World Series.

It is safe to say baseball, tagged "America's game," is followed by more observers than any other sport in the United States — K-State's head baseball coach Mike Clark included.

Clark said he follows professional baseball "very closely."

"I worked with the Royals' organization for five years," he said. "I've also got six players (I coached) in minor leagues, so I try to keep track of them.

"When I get the sports page in the morning, I look first at the college scores. Right after that, I look at the pro scores."

Clark, "a lifelong (St. Louis) Cardinals fan," said he likes Manhattan's proximity in relation to Kansas City, Mo.

"I worked in the Royals' instructional league one fall," he said. "Guys like Bret Saberhagen and Buddy Biancalana were there at the time. It really got me fired up to be a Royals fan."

Clark's Royals fared about as well as other professional teams in exhibition baseball this spring — they were 12-13 and had the second-fewest losses in the American League West (Minnesota had 10). Every team in the American League East also had double-figure losses.

National League teams performed better, but only slightly. Only two of 12 teams recorded less than 10 losses — St. Louis had six and Cincinnati had nine.

So just what does this mean for the 1987 season, 161 games (for most teams) young?

In all probability, the season will be filled with chills, thrills and upsets. And luck will have as much to do with it as anything as far as who is crowned world champions.

So tell us, Coach, which teams are your picks in 1987?

"I'm not very good at predictions," Clark said, "but in the National League East, I like the (New York) Mets. Even with all their troubles, they've got too much firepower."

But one major concern for the Mets, who won the NL East last year, is star pitcher Dwight Gooden who is out indefinitely due to drug problems.

Clark also picks last year's National League West champion, Houston, to repeat.

"I think Houston will come back again. They have too much pitching, and the Astrodome is too much of a home-field advantage."

Clark said the American League East is the hardest division to pick a winner in.

"I don't think Boston will repeat," he said, "so I'll come out of left (field) and say Toronto.

"In the American League West, I'll take the Royals. I like their offense a lot."

And who will wear the championship rings in October?

"It will be Kansas City vs. the Mets," he said, "and Kansas City will win it in six games."

The Royals lost Monday, but if you're a Kansas City fan as is Coach Clark, keep the faith. There's still about six months left in the season.

New release rivals Levinson's 'Diner'

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Barry Levinson's newest film, "Tin Men," is often reminiscent of "Diner" — his critically acclaimed 1982 film. In "Tin Men," though the characters are older, 25-30 years older, they could be some of the same characters we saw in "Diner."

"Tin Men" is set in 1963, when cars still had fins and women wore horn-rimmed glasses. "B.B." Babowsky (Richard Dreyfuss), an aluminum siding salesman, has just bought a new Cadillac. As he pulls out of the parking lot, he's rammed in the side by another Cadillac, driven by another aluminum siding salesman, Ernest Tilley (Danny DeVito). This is the beginning of their feud, for they both vow revenge.

Film Review

During the next few days, they take delight in vandalizing each other's car. But then B.B. takes the feud one step further and puts the move on Tilley's wife, Nora (Barbara Hershey). Talking her into his bed isn't difficult, especially when she has an insensitive husband like Tilley. Tilley's idea of a good time is sitting down in front of the TV with a can of beer. He can't fathom why she'd ever want to go on a picnic: "You take the food out of the kitchen, into a field and then you eat it. I don't get it."

But once B.B. has bedded Nora, Tilley says keep her. She's much more important to him than that, though. In the scene where he throws all her clothes from their second-story bedroom window, there's an insightful moment when Tilley stops and rests at the window, and at this moment we know that he's torn up inside.

But the troubles don't end here. The Home Improvement Commission is looking to uncover the scams used by salesmen like B.B. and Tilley. Before they know it, they're being called to testify before the board.

Director Levinson carefully balances these parts of the plot to create an amazingly authentic picture of the life of salesmen. Instead of playing this story as a farce, Levinson gives the comedy a sad, sometimes even mournful, side. This is because B.B. and Tilley are both a little bit pathetic. They see life as one big con job, and women are little more than targets for their cons. Tilley is married but his wife is little more than a servant. And B.B., even though he's quite a dancer (or so we hear), has always remained a bachelor.

DeVito's performance as Tilley is similar to his Louie DePalma from "Taxi", but DeVito is much more restrained than ever before, particularly at the movie's end. This helps make Tilley all the more believable.

Dreyfuss, as B.B., delivers his strongest performance since "The Goodbye Girl." B.B. is often an arrogant boor, but Dreyfuss allows a more tender side of his character to show through. There's a wonderful scene where he means to tell Nora he can't see her anymore, but she responds so enthusiastically to him that he's tongue-tied, a rare condition for this super-slick salesman.

With Tilley, Barbara Hershey's Nora looks plain and weary, but when she falls for B.B. she starts to glow. She gives the movie some needed moments of warmth. Without her, the movie might have been overbearing — simply a battle between two overgrown brats.

But the real star of the film is director Barry Levinson. Instead of completely relying upon the actors to create the humor, Levinson creates humor through his use of the camera. At one point he pans down the line of Cadillacs outside the aluminum siding warehouse, only to find the tiny Chevette which B.B. must drive while his Cadillac is being repaired.

"Tin Men" shows that "Diner" wasn't just a fluke. It reveals Levinson to be a major filmmaker, nearly in the same class as Woody Allen.

folklore. Everyone has their own style," she said. "A new perspective often helps the student develop. Teaching comes from person to person. By seeing a new perspective they can expand and develop, constantly supplementing their current knowledge with additional knowledge."

Steele believes that dance is an additional form of communication.

"Instead of verbal communication, it is communication with the body. With training, the eye can become adapted to reading the message that is being revealed through the dance."

In the pieces she choreographs, Steele said, she attempts to transfer messages involving aspects of life that may be found meaningful or intriguing.

"The greatest feeling is when someone in the audience can identify and relate with the message that you are trying to portray," she said.

Steele said she often begins developing ideas with her perception on a visual level, but once the idea starts to take shape, it develops a life of its own.

Steele believes in an organic sense of music instead of a counted sense.

"Counting tends to make (the dance) more mechanical. By becoming part of the music, the dance is heightened because of the music," she said.

"Once a person understands their muscles and the possibilities of the body, dance takes on a whole new perspective."

Hayden said he wanted to find out how the commission stood on the study and other issues related to the compact.

"It is imperative that the compact commission meet quickly and address the concerns," Hayden said. "Based on what we know today, we would have grave concerns about proceeding."

Peery said the commission had planned to meet in May but would now meet earlier.

"We'll obviously accommodate the governor's request for a meeting," Peery said. "It will be held by the end of the month."

Hayden said if the compact commission does not reject the "Phase 2" study, he may call a special session to consider legislation to withdraw from the compact. He has already said he might call one to consider improvements to the state's highway system.

Student masters rarely chosen music degree

By ERIN MULCAHY
Collegian Reporter

For the third time in the history of the Department of Music, a student is majoring in woodwind performance.

Cornell Kinderknecht, senior in music performance, is one of only three students who have ever taken on a degree requiring study and performance of five woodwind instruments: clarinet, saxophone, oboe, bassoon and flute. Kinderknecht also plays the piano, organ, harpsichord, guitar, English horn and bass.

Kinderknecht's recital tonight at 8 in All Faiths Chapel will feature compositions played on the bassoon, oboe, English horn and alto saxophone. The recital is open to the public.

While in fourth grade, Kinderknecht was persuaded by his mother to take saxophone lessons. His interest in music continued, and during the eighth grade Kinderknecht began piano lessons.

"My piano teacher was an old, neighborhood lady who believed in the arts and thought everyone should be educated in the arts," he said. "Her views on music influenced me and have continued to stick in my head."

Throughout most of high school, Kinderknecht, the youngest of seven children, played the bass in his family band which traveled around the state playing for wedding dances and other engagements. The band, which performed from 1966-82, was named "Angie's Polka Band" after his mother.

Kinderknecht, who received his computer science degree in May 1986, became involved with the music department four years ago by taking harpsichord lessons.

Sara Funkhouser, associate professor of music, was a positive influence in Kinderknecht's decision to pursue a degree in music, he said.

"Sara told me to go ahead and try music before I was fresh out of school," Kinderknecht said. "She has helped me advance and set up a curriculum to complete in two years."

Thirty-two instrumental lesson hours are required of woodwind majors. Kinderknecht divides the hours among the five instruments of his major.

"I give performances on as many of the instruments as I can," he said.

Kinderknecht finds there are more hours of work involved in music than in computer science.

"Music leaves more room for my own personal ideas, which is a change from computer science," he said. "In music I have a choice to say, 'Hey, I want to do this, and I am going to learn how to play this.'"

Kinderknecht has not lost sight of his computer science background. During the week, he works at Long-Term Ecological Research, part of the Division of Biology, as a computer programmer.

The Baroque period is Kinderknecht's favorite musical style and Handel is his favorite composer.

"Baroque is the most fun to perform because of the flexibility of its time," he said. "There is a lot of room in Baroque because the music is all-purpose — it's written for a set of instruments."

Kinderknecht is a member of the K-State Orchestra, Collegium Musicum, a woodwind trio and two other ensembles.

The Collegium Musicum is a Renaissance vocal and instrumental group of students, faculty and area residents.

A few years ago, Kinderknecht was a member of the "Park Avenue Band," in which he played the bass, saxophone and synthesizer.

"We taped a demo, and also a video, for WIBW radio station in Topeka," he said. "The video aired a few times on area television stations."

Kinderknecht earns extra money teaching piano and saxophone lessons to about 10 students during the week. On the weekend, he is a church organist at Seven Dolors Catholic Church, 731 Pierre St.

Kinderknecht has no definite plans for the future. A year ago, he would have been planning a career in computer science. Today, Kinderknecht would like to mix his two fields, computer science and music, and possibly develop music software and electronic musical instruments.

The idea of studio music work still interests Kinderknecht, but the career opportunities in the field are tough, he said.

"Playing opportunities are better in metro areas, especially on the coast," Kinderknecht said. A studio musician job involves work in a recording studio as a back-up musician for singers cutting records and demos.

"I've found it valuable to study fine arts," he said. "Music allows to some degree open-mindedness and a broader view of things."

Available farm credit little help

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — As farmers start spring planting, billions of credit dollars remain on tap but offer little hope to those at the end of the line in the fight to hang onto their land.

Counter to the Dust Bowl image that has colored much of the farm debate, most producers obtained loans for spring planting. But a sizable fraction again ran out of credit and are now effectively broke.

"Perhaps 10 percent are dead in the water" nationally, says Bob Jolly, an Iowa State University agricultural economist.

He estimates that as many as a third of Iowa farmers may be wrestling with financial problems that started with the collapse of rural land prices five years ago and linger on.

"It's a long, painful, grinding process," he says.

And yet many farmers who managed to avoid the price collapse are in fairly good condition.

"Maybe 50 percent are feeling no pain at all," says Paul Quam, chief executive officer of the Hayesville, Iowa, Bank.

In fact, between personal savings and government payments, a number of farmers appeared to be in such good shape that they were able to finance their operations without loans.

"There's plenty of credit out there," Emanuel Melichar, a Federal Reserve System economist and authority on farm credit, says. "But quite a few farmers are saying no thanks."

Land prices soared in the 1970s. But as crop prices fell at the start of the 1980s, the cost of land tumbled, too.

Land that sold for $750 an acre at the start of the 1970s in some cases skyrocketed to $3,000 an acre only to lose 50 percent of its value.

Farmers who borrowed heavily to acquire land in some cases got stuck. Their acreage could not produce enough cash even to pay their interest.

Farmers unable to get loans often go through a financial death agony as they fight to avoid going under, experts say.

Nutritionist educates coaches on 'ABCs' of health benefits

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY
Collegian Reporter

To receive good nutrition and develop bigger muscles, the average athlete should double his or her protein intake.

According to one nutrition expert, this statement is a myth.

"It's a common myth that athletes need a lot of protein," said Jeanne Dray, nutrition educator and project director of "The ABCs of Nutrition Education." "In fact, muscles are built by exercising the muscles, not by eating protein."

Dray said she plans to present this and other nutritional information to those most able to influence athletes' diets — their coaches — in a series of workshops for high school coaches scheduled across the state in April.

"The workshops will cover four basic topics: the pregame meal, fluid intake, weight gain/loss and nutrient intake," Dray said.

"Today's athletes are very interested in how nutrition affects athletic performance," she said. "Coaches are often their primary source of nutrition information."

In the workshops, Dray will help coaches separate nutrition myths from nutrition facts.

"There are general nutrition guidelines that will work for everybody, whether they are athletes or not," she said. "The only difference is an athlete who exercises more than 90 minutes will need a high-carbohydrate diet."

Most of the athletes to whom Dray will speak are junior high and high school students, and many do not exercise for an extended period of time, she said.

As part of the instruction, Dray presents the coaches with case studies and asks them to discuss solutions.

A sample case study is Jim, a 15-year-old high school sophomore. He loves to play football, but is smaller than he would like to be. Hoping to put on weight and muscle, he has been lifting weights and using protein supplements for a couple of weeks, but these supplements can be expensive.

After group discussions and advice from the coaches, Dray presents her answer to the case study.

"Jim needs 56 grams of protein per day," she said. "He can get this from the foods he eats. About 6 ounces of meat will give him all the protein he needs."

To gain weight, Jim should increase his caloric intake, drink calorie-dense beverages and consume moderate amounts of fat-containing foods. Muscle tissue is increased by exercising those muscles. Jim should not gain more than 3 pounds every week, Dray said.

Taking protein supplements will not increase muscle mass, but instead could be hazardous.

"High-protein diets can affect liver and kidney function, promote calcium excretion and cause dizziness, fluid imbalance, dehydration and even death," she said.

Dray also suggests athletes steer clear of steroids because they can stunt growth, cause acne, deepen a person's voice and alter sex organs, she said.

Coaches face a challenge when talking to teen-agers about nutrition. Many people believe snacking is harmful, but for teens in particular, snacks are often their primary source of food. Dray said it is especially important to eat nutritious snacks.

Snacks can be both nutritious and tasty, she said. To prove her point, she serves nutritious cookies to the coaches attending her two-hour workshops.

Made from peanut butter and raisin bran, the cookies are one example of nutritious food she believes teens will accept. Other suggestions for healthy snacks include milk, fruits, vegetables, yogurt and fruits with peanut butter.

Dray will lead workshops April 7 in Hays, April 8 in Garden City, April 14 in Chanute, April 21 in Wichita and April 28 in Lawrence. Coaches from a variety of sports including football, volleyball, basketball, track and wrestling are enrolled for the workshops, funded by the Kansas Department of Education.

Coaches and participants in the workshops will receive a folder titled "The ABCs of Nutritional Education," a nutrition information guide designed for coaches that was researched and written by the Department of Foods and Nutrition.

In addition to these workshops, K-State will offer a Telenet course this summer on "Nutrition for Coaches" for two or three hours of college credit.

The eight-week course will start the second week of June. The class is recommended to anyone interested in proper diet and nutrition.

Dray has also conducted nutritional workshops for preschool teachers and school nurses.

Hard work rewards educator

By SHELLY SHAFFER
Collegian Reporter

Often found among test tubes, microscopes, petri dishes and various food samples, one food science professor combines laboratory and classroom work with worldwide guest lecturing.

Daniel Fung, professor of animal sciences and industry, has been invited to serve a three-year term as a scientific lecturer by the Institute of Food Technologists, Chicago.

"This is a great honor," said Fung, also the chairman of the Food Science Graduate Program. Only six scientists were chosen this year from across the nation.

Fung said his name will be added to the list of lecturers that are available to speak to the 50 subsections of the institute.

Fung has lectured in more than 25 countries. He said he recently returned from France and will be going to Taiwan in June, Cambridge University in September and Italy in November.

His most requested lecture topic is on "Rapid Methods and Automation in Microbiology," he said. K-State offers the only extensive program in this topic in the world, Fung said.

Fung said he started from scratch to develop and design the University's food microbiology program. The program was officially introduced as an international workshop in 1981.

Students from 15 countries and 33 states have participated in the program, he said.

"You have to love what you do. If you do, no amount of sacrifice is too much," Fung said.

Fung teaches three classes and does research, as well as, lecturing.

Fung's family has had to make the biggest adjustment with his busy schedule of events.

"They accept that I like to work," he said.

On the average he said he sleeps 4 to 5 hours a day.

"There are no Saturdays or Sundays," he said. Fung said he works all the time and if a student needs help, he makes a point to be available.

"I treat students like friends. I want to share with them and learn from them," he said.

Fung said he encourages students to become well-rounded by spending time in as many different activities as possible.

Fung said he chose K-State over other universities because the colleges and departments work well together.

Last year, nine U.S. Department of Agriculture Ph.D. fellowships were awarded to universities throughout the United States. K-State received six of those, he said.

Fung said he views this as an example of the University's efforts to work together.

"Food science should receive more attention and support for the program as a discipline on campus," he said.

Local elections provide 8 new office-holders

By The Collegian Staff

Eight area residents' days were brightened twice Tuesday. Once by the sun, and again as election results were counted in Manhattan City Commission and USD 383 Board of Education races.

Kent Glasscock, Richard Hayter and Nancy Denning were the top vote-getters in the City Commission race. The trio outlasted opponents Bob Newsome, Ruth Schrum and Roger Maughmer. The winners will join current commissioners Gene Klingler and Dave Fiser when the new commission convenes April 21.

The newly elected school board will consist of Jim Lindquist, Joleen Hill, Barbara Withee and Mary Nichols, who won four-year terms, and Beverly Eversmeyer, who will assume a two-year post on the five-member board.

Of 17,964 registered voters, 7,060 — 39.3 percent — cast ballots in the Riley County general election.

Glasscock, who received 24.56 percent of the votes, said he is happy with the results and ready to begin work.

"I'm very pleased," he said. "I think there's nothing wrong with being on top."

Glasscock, president of Home Lumber Co., said the first "major challenge" of the commission will be finding a new city manager to replace Don Harmon, who will be retiring July 1.

"Right away we're going to have to begin dealing with hiring a new city manager," Glasscock said. "That's an important position in the city. It's the head administrative position and much of the character of the way city government works in Manhattan is controlled by the city manager."

Richard Hayter, director of engineering extension at K-State, said after the commission picks a new city manager, the issue of funding agencies will be foremost on the agenda.

"Down the road some, an issue we have to take a serious look at is the question of reduced federal funding for social services. Agencies hurt by the lack of funding need some sense of security so they can do some planning," said Hayter, who received 21.15 percent of the vote.

Denning, president of Denning, Buster and Hungate marketing agency, echoed the other two new commissioners' sentiments that a new city manager and funding will be the first two challenges.

In choosing someone for city manager, Denning, who received 18.96 percent of the vote, said she would look for "someone with integrity, someone from a similar background of what we're looking for and certainly someone with experience, both educational and professional."

In the race for the USD 383 four-year seats, Lindquist, Hill, Withee and Nichols outlasted opponents, Flordie Pettis, Bob Shoop and Shirley Bramhall.

Lindquist, director of Riley County Cooperative Extension, received the most votes with 23 percent.

He said his campaign was a group effort and the board's first challenge would be "to work with the limited financial resources available to us."

"We have board members capable of making those (financial) decisions," he said.

Voters gave Hill, a local apartment and land manager, 21.20 percent of the school board vote.

She said she appreciated the community support during her campaign and will strive to learn more about the job.

Citizens inform city about water enigma

Manhattan City Commission voted Tuesday to sell city water to Riley County, which in turn would provide the clean water to residents of Moehlman Bottoms.

The commission voted last month to provide water to 36 homes in the Riley County Landfill vicinity to replace well water suspected of contamination.

The March decision put a limit on the number of residences to receive the water supply. Commissioners decided to supply water to current residents but disqualify any incoming residents from the water source.

Tuesday's vote voided the original decision and raised that number of homes to 49. It also raised some questions from present Moehlman Bottoms residents.

Bill Carson, owner of Carson Home Sales, Manhattan, attended the meeting to ask commissioners to include property he is purchasing at Moehlman Bottoms in the water service.

Carson is purchasing the property from FirstBank and plans to put 13 mobile homes on the lot.

"The property itself is a licensed mobile home park," Carson said.

Moehlman Bottoms resident Becky Choitz said she had "a great deal of difficulty" with Carson's request to be included in the water district.

"If he wanted that water, he could have been fighting with us from the beginning to get it," she said. "He didn't have to let us scrap and carry on the way we had to to get attention."

Choitz also argued that the property Carson is purchasing has been vacant for more than a year, which she said technically disqualified it from receiving the water supply.

City Commissioner Gene Klingler expressed concern that Commissioner Dave Fiser was a member of FirstBank's board of directors.

"Do you have any feeling that you have a conflict of interest in this?" Klingler asked Fiser.

"I don't believe so," Fiser said. "I've been consistent always on the fact that I wanted to extend the water to Hunters Island."

Commissioners told Choitz the only thing they were voting on was to agree to sell water to the county, which would in turn supply the water to the residents.

"The county will have the benefit district, do all the collecting of the revenues and will turn it over to the city at a price that's higher than what the city people are paying for the same services," said City Attorney William Frost.

"That's all we're involved with," he said. "Any complaints anyone else has, you talk to the county about the way the benefit district's set up."

In other business, the commissioners discussed the possibility of expanding Manhattan's cable company. A wider selection of cable television channels will be available to residents with this expansion.

Liquor compromise bill passes House, progresses to Senate

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — After rejecting efforts aimed at boosting state beer and liquor taxes, the House on Tuesday approved a compromise version of a bill legalizing public liquor by the drink in Kansas.

Approval of the compromise language, on a vote of 90-33, set the stage for the issue to be brought before the Senate today. Senate Majority Leader Bud Burke predicted the version House and Senate negotiators agreed upon last week would easily win approval in the upper chamber.

Although the legislation overhauls a wide range of Kansas' traditionally strict liquor laws, the main feature of the bill is to authorize public liquor by the drink in restaurants located in the 36 counties where voters approved the issue during the November general election.

The measure also would legalize the sale of 3.2 percent beer on Sundays in taverns that have at least 30 percent food sales and allow liquor stores to begin advertising prices and brands of merchandise starting in 1989.

Lawmakers approved raising taxes on beer, wine and spirits by $12 million to $15 million annually when the proposal was first considered in the House on March 19. The bill passed the Senate on Feb. 18.

The tax issue was the main point of contention during about 45 minutes of debate Tuesday on the compromise language. The conference committee agreed to virtually all of the changes made in the House except the increased taxes.

However, the chamber voted 40-80 against sending the bill back to committee. Rep. Jack Beauchamp, R-Ottawa, led the efforts to put the bill back into conference to reattach language to increase the liquor taxes, saying the time is ripe for such a move.

"We have lit the stick of dynamite at both ends here in the state of Kansas," Beauchamp said. "We have raised the speed limit and let the liquor flow."

But Rep. Robert H. Miller, chairman of the House Federal and State Affairs Committee, warned there would be dangers in returning the bill to conference because some senators might favor delaying any action on the liquor-by-the-drink question this year.

"I don't think they're going to give in on the taxes," Miller said. "They may just walk away without liquor by the drink."

In addition to creating the new public drinking establishments, which could operate from 9 a.m. to 2 a.m. seven days per week including election days, the bill would:

— Allow caterers to serve liquor by the drink if 30 percent of their sales at each event will be in food.

Town mourns death of 'inspiring' victim

By The Associated Press

KENSINGTON — A chorus of voices filled the high school gym Tuesday to say farewell to Cameron Beach, the small-town teen-ager who became the center of controversy when it was disclosed he had contracted the AIDS virus.

Beach, 17, died of heart failure Friday at Smith County Memorial Hospital. It was his lifelong struggle with heart problems that led to the AIDS infection when he received a blood transfusion during surgery in 1985.

About 650 people attended the service for Beach at the Kensington High School Gymnasium.

The Rev. Greg Gaskamp of St. John Lutheran Church described Beach as a boy who loved life and whose courage was a source of inspiration and strength to everyone who knew him.

Beach and Smith Center USD 237 were thrown into a controversy last month when his parents, Curtis and Mary Beach of Kensington, announced at an all-school assembly at Smith Center High School that he had contracted the AIDS virus but not a full-blown case of the incurable disease.

Gaskamp said that despite Beach's illness, he enjoyed life. "Cameron loved living, and the simple joys of life brought the most pleasure," Gaskamp said.

Senate keeps Kansas in waste compact

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Kansas Senate rejected a proposal to withdraw from the Central Interstate Low-Level Radioactive Waste Compact on Tuesday, but acted to ban burial of the waste in Kansas.

Sen. Paul Feleciano, D-Wichita, spoke uninterrupted for an hour trying to build a case for Kansas to withdraw from the compact.

"This is the single most important issue the state of Kansas has ever faced," Feleciano said. "We need to pull out of this compact. There are other options we can pursue but we must pull out."

Sen. Phil Martin, D-Pittsburg, said withdrawal was important to prevent Kansas from being treated unfairly by the terms of the compact.

"Kansas is getting a very raw deal by staying in the compact," Martin said. "I'm convinced of that more than ever before."

Feleciano and Martin cited a study conducted by a New York consulting firm, Dames and Moore, identifying possible locations for the compact's waste dump. According to the report, 75 percent of the locations were in Kansas. The Kansas Geological Survey has criticized the study as seriously flawed.

"You would be shocked at the sites they picked in Kansas," Feleciano said, noting some of the locations had water tables just 40 feet below the ground surface and received about 30 inches of rainfall annually.

He said a number of reasons demand Kansas withdraw from the compact, citing the poor track record of similar waste dumps which have contaminated groundwater reserves and the probability of low-level waste retaining its radioactivity for hundreds of years.

Sen. Merrill Werts, R-Junction City, opposed withdrawing from the compact. He asked senators whether they would be thinking of pulling out if one of the other four compact states was picked to host the dump.

"Would you feel differently if Nebraska was chosen?" Werts said. "We have the power to regulate selection of a disposal facility site. The developer must abide by our laws. We call the shots and set the rules."

The compact is an association of five states — Kansas, Nebraska, Oklahoma, Arkansas and Louisiana — formed to find one central location for a regional radioactive waste dump.

Feleciano and Martin objected loudly to the provision in the compact which allows the decision for placement of a waste dump to be left to the private developer selected by the compact to built the facility.

Two companies interested in developing the compact's disposal facility submitted formal applications and a developer will be selected by June 5.

"The developer gets to pick the state," Martin said. "I can't imagine us abrigating our responsibility to the developers."

Feleciano said a vote by the Legislature to withdraw from the compact would give Gov. Mike Hayden a "strong bargaining tool" as his representatives prepare to meet with other states in the compact on the issue of the flawed environmental study.

Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, warned of very serious ramifications to the state by pulling out of the compact, including the possibility Kansas could become a dumping ground for all other states if it remains independent from all compacts.

Pope gives advice to Argentines

VIEDMA, Argentina — Pope John Paul II on Tuesday called for fairer distribution of Argentina's natural bounty, advised gauchos and farmworkers not to migrate to the cities and told Indians to defend their heritage.

He also heard an outspoken local bishop imply this country's Roman Catholic establishment did not do enough to defend human rights during a 1976-1983 military regime that tortured and killed thousands of suspected opponents.

In Viedma, on the northern edge of the vast Patagonian scrubland, the pontiff encouraged development of the nearly empty region.

"Take advantage of the natural resources of this region...so as to achieve ever more human living conditions and populate more and more this extensive area," he said from an outdoor platform surrounded by sagebrush near the airport.

The democratically elected government of President Raul Alfonsin, whose December 1983 inauguration ended military rule, plans to transfer the national capital from Buenos Aires, with 10 million people, to Viedma, population 30,000. The transfer is intended to spur provincial development.

Committee supports tax on betting

TOPEKA — A Senate subcommittee finished its work Tuesday on a House-passed bill that would implement pari-mutuel wagering on dog and horse races in Kansas, recommending a simplification of the measure's proposed tax structure.

The subcommittee recommended setting the tax on straight bets on horse races at 3 percent and at 5 percent for straight bets on dog races. Exotic bets, such as betting on multiple races at the same time, would be taxed at similar rates.

As the measure passed the House, it contained rates of 3 percent on straight bets at horse races and on dog and horse races at combination tracks.

Hayden warns of utility tax veto

TOPEKA — Gov. Mike Hayden Tuesday urged the Senate to kill a bill that would raise an estimated $40 million a year in revenue by placing the state sales tax back on most utility bills.

If the Legislature passes the bill, he will veto it, the governor warned.

"This proposal is ill-conceived and should be rejected by the Kansas Senate," Hayden said in a statement released through his press office.

"I pledge to use the full authority of my office in vetoing any attempt to add this tax burden onto the backs of Kansas ratepayers."

Sen. Leroy Hayden, D-Satanta, succeeded in adding a provision to another bill during debate in the Senate Assessment and Taxation Committee to eliminate the sales tax exemption on natural gas, electricity, heat, water, propane, liquified petroleum gas, coal, wood and other fuel sources.

The 1979 Legislature removed the sales tax from those utilities.

Leroy Hayden's amendment did not remove the sales tax exemption on intrastate telephone service, which applies to monthly charges but not long distance calls.

The bill, which originally exempted only the repair and maintenance expenditures for university dormitories from the sales tax, is resting in a low position on the Senate debate calendar.

Hinckley wants to live with killer

WASHINGTON — Presidential assailant John W. Hinckley Jr. says he wants to live with a woman who once killed her sleeping daughter and is now "the biggest influence in my life," according to court papers filed Tuesday.

Hinckley, acquitted by reason of insanity of attempted murder charges stemming from the 1981 shooting of President Reagan, recently told a psychiatrist he hopes to eventually gain release from St. Elizabeths Hospital in Washington to live with Leslie DeVeau.

DeVeau, a one-time Washington socialite, was found innocent by reason of insanity of charges she murdered her child in 1982.

She met Hinckley at St. Elizabeths and there were published reports in 1985 that the couple was engaged to be married and that Hinckley had given up his obsession with actress Jodie Foster, who starred in "Taxi Driver." Hinckley had said that he shot Reagan to impress the actress.

DeVeau has since been released from the government-run mental hospital where Hinckley was committed after his 1982 acquittal.

Soviets claim AIDS U.S. creation

WASHINGTON — The Soviet Union has mounted an unusually broad disinformation campaign aimed at convincing the world that the AIDS virus originated in an American military laboratory, U.S. officials say.

The campaign, which began 17 months ago and shows no signs of stopping, has prompted strong denials and repeated protests by American officials.

Arthur A. Hartman, who recently stepped down as the U.S. ambassador to Moscow, has labeled the stories as "nothing more than a blatant and repugnant attempt to sow hatred and fear of Americans among the Soviet population and to abuse a medical tragedy affecting people all over the world...for base propaganda purposes."

Such complaints have been met with Soviet silence, however, leaving the Defense and State departments to deal with what they say is a lie that simply won't go away.

The Soviet allegation is dramatic: the growing epidemic of AIDS — acquired immune deficiency syndrome — that now plagues the world began with a biological warfare experiment at the U.S. Army's Fort Detrick, Md., laboratories.

First published in October 1985 by the Soviet weekly "Literaturnaya Gazeta," the charge was immediately denied by the U.S. government and dismissed as Soviet propaganda.

Since then, however, the Soviets have embellished the story while citing alleged scientific experts to lend weight to the charges. And according to the Pentagon, the story has now been reported by the news media of more than 60 countries, including the United States, in more than 30 different languages.

Chicago mayor wins re-election

CHICAGO — Mayor Harold Washington swept to a second term Tuesday, defeating Democratic arch-rival Edward Vrdolyak and becoming the first Chicago mayor to win re-election since the late Richard J. Daley.

Vrdolyak, a former alderman who had spearheaded the opposition to the city's first black mayor on the City Council, admitted defeat two hours after the polls closed.

"I want to congratulate Mayor Harold Washington on winning this election...I've won 'em and I've lost 'em, but I always congratulate the winner," Vrdolyak told cheering supporters after he called Washington to concede.

Missouri waterways sites of PCP dumps

By The Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — The Environmental Protection Agency asked a U.S. House subcommittee Tuesday to provide either the federal agency or the FBI with the identity of an informant who testified before the panel about alleged dumping of toxic PCBs in Missouri waterways.

A hooded witness identified only as John Doe testifed in Washington Monday before the Government Operations environment subcommittee that he had illegally dumped "a couple of thousand" PCB-containing capacitors into the Missouri River and Kansas City area lakes in 1984.

Dale Armstrong, a spokesman for EPA's regional office in Kansas City, Kan., said the agency asked the committee headed by Rep. Mike Synar, D-Okla., for the informant's name.

"It would help us tremendously if the informant could help us identify areas where alleged dumping took place," Armstrong said. "...our investigation is blocked until we learn from the informant where to look."

However, Rep. Alan Wheat of Kansas City, who participated in the subcommittee hearing, said the EPA should investigate immediately.

"The EPA has been given specific information on the allegations," he said. "They have been given a map of the dump locations. The subcommittee has been cooperating with them."

PCBs, or polychlorinated biphenyls, were used as insulating oil in electrical gear but were banned by Congress in 1976. Some old machinery still contains the cancer-causing chemical.

Synar criticized the EPA at the hearing for its PCB disposal policy, noting such dumpings also probably occur elsewhere in the country.

The witness said he received cash bonuses to carry out the night-time operations when he worked for CB Oil, a waste PCB firm that House investigators said was a subcontractor for PCB of Missouri Inc., which has since lost its EPA permit for processing PCBs.

The equipment reportedly was dumped in and along the shorelines of the Missouri River, Lake Jacomo, Smithville Lake and Riverfront Park in the Kansas City area and at the Lake of the Ozarks.

EPA and city officials said they don't believe the dumping, if true, would pose an immediate health risk. PCBs are insoluble in water and would collect along the bottom of a river or lake, where they could pose a long-term health hazard as fish eat contaminated soil and humans eat the fish.

U.S. Army Corps of Engineers officials were testing for signs of PCBs Tuesday at Smithville Lake.

Roger Mihalko, program manager for the environmental hazards section of the Kansas City Health Department, said he "can't believe" Riverfront Park is contaminated.

Student receives national ROTC honor

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY
Collegian Reporter

For the ninth consecutive year, a K-State student has received the George C. Marshall award, the highest national honor offered by the Reserve Officer Training Corp.

By receiving this award, Rick Sadat, senior in mechanical engineering and battalion commander, said he is recognized as the top Army ROTC cadet in the nation.

Nationwide, 314 universities offer the ROTC program, but only the top 84 battalion commanders, the top cadet at each university, are considered for the award. This is the ninth year the award has been offered.

Cadets selected to receive the award represent the best in the country in terms of leadership ability and educational excellence, Sadat said.

"Even before receiving the award last month, I felt confident about being selected, mainly because the ROTC program here is recognized as being one of the best in the country," he said.

A native of Pakistan, Sadat spent two years at the University of Engineering in Lehore, Pakistan, before moving to the United States with his father in 1980.

Sadat's father, who worked for the irrigation department in Pakistan, retired and moved to Chicago, where his brother lived. Sadat said he moved with his father because he wanted to travel and finish his education in the United States.

Sadat joined the U.S. Army shortly after coming to the United States and continued his education. He received training to become a medical specialist and spent four years at the Irwin Army Hospital at Fort Riley from 1981-85.

"About a year and a half after coming to the United States, I decided to join the Army," he said. "It wasn't a hard decision for me. I've always been interested in being in the military.

"I don't think I could have received better leadership or educational training anywhere."

He resumed studies in mechanical engineering at K-State in 1985 and plans to graduate this May. Sadat has been on both the K-State and the national dean's list three consecutive semesters.

Sadat will leave April 14 with Gen. Myrna Williamson, ROTC commanding general for this region, to attend the George C. Marshall award seminar in Washington, D.C.

"All cadets selected for the seminar are escorted by the regional commanding general," he said.

Cadets were judged on academic performance, military performance and extracurricular activities. Cadets must also be in the top 5 percent of their class at advanced ROTC military training camp to be considered for the award, Sadat said.

"Receiving the George C. Marshall award is the highest honor a ROTC cadet can receive. I am very proud to be selected," Sadat said.

The award seminar will provide four days in which military, civilian and award-winning ROTC leaders can discuss issues, he said.

People giving seminar presentations will range from high officials, such as the secretary of the Army and the chief of staff, to authorities at various military and civilian institutions.

The seminar will focus on U.S. security. Sadat said issues will include a review of critical security problems and the leadership qualities of George C. Marshall.

Sadat has made arrangements to visit the Aberdeen Proving Ground, the location of his first assignment, while in Washington, D.C. He received orders to leave on June 14 to be trained to work as an environmental engineer.

He also plans to attend the George Washington Unversity in Washington, D.C., to complete a master's degree in public health.

"THE DEADLY SILENCE"

Dear K-Staters:
The Kansas State University Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service recently produced a video tape titled, "The Deadly Silence", which covers the tragic events of an alcohol-related accident and death.
In June 1984, Lola Bolek Tucker, the mother of two young children, was killed by a drunken driver named Michael Atherton. Mr. Atherton is serving a 3-10 years sentence at the Lansing State Penitentiary.
In the video "The Deadly Silence", Donna Bolek, Lola's mother and founder of the Riley County Chapter of M.A.D.D., as well as Mr. Atherton are interviewed. They both talk about how this tragic accident has forever changed their lives.
The video tape is 15 minutes long and is available for checkout, free of charge, to any KSU student, faculty or staff. Please call or come by our office (8 a.m. to 5 p.m.) to reserve or checkout a copy of this video tape (532-6432, Holton Hall 102).
Hopefully all K-Staters will take the time and view "The Deadly Silence"—it may be the most beneficial 15 minutes you spend this year!

Future Farmers' office should stay at K-State

A proposal made recently by the Kansas Department of Education to move the Future Farmers of America state office headquarters from Manhattan to Topeka has generated some controversy, and rightfully so. KDOE claims the move will produce several benefits, including paying salaries directly to the headquarter's staff instead of giving money to the University and having it allocate the salaries.

Also, advocates of the move say moving to Topeka will increase the visibility of the student organization and will strengthen communication between the department and FFA. These claims may well be true. However, the negative connotations may outweigh the positive aspects of the proposal.

Moving the headquarters could mean a weakening of the ties between the FFA office and the College of Agriculture. In addition, the state FFA headquarters hosts a number of events on campus such as state judging contests and the state FFA convention. Having the state office located in Topeka would cause inconvenience in the planning and preparation for these events.

Most of the state FFA officers attend K-State and frequent the headquarters running errands and doing duties for the office. Moving the office would be of great inconvenience to the officers trying to work on projects. Also, FFA advisers who visit the campus for contests will no longer be able to stop by the office to pick up supplies, forms, etc., if the move is completed.

Moving the state FFA headquarters may increase communication with KDOE but it would likely decrease interaction with the organization's members. There are benefits to moving the FFA headquarters, but they do not equal the problems caused by that move.

Affairs of heart cloud judgment of Marines

The Few. The Proud? The Marine Guards in the U.S. Embassy in Moscow.

Apparently the Marines need a clarification on the meaning of the Marine motto, "Semper Fidelis" (Always Faithful), prominently displayed in the embassy. Always faithful, but to whom? The U.S. government or Soviet women?

Investigations have revealed that two Marines having affairs with Soviet women allowed spies access to the embassy, even some of the most high-security areas of the building.

These men were chosen to guard secret information in an embassy located in the capital city of a country long considered the leading threat to democracy. Instead of upholding their obligations, security guards decided they would rather be tour guides for curious Soviet visitors.

It is incredible that the illicit behavior of some members of the military elite was allowed to cause a national security disaster. U.S. secret codes, sources, methods of operation used by the CIA and other secrets were kept in these top-secret areas of the embassy.

Marine security guard Sgt. Clayton J. Lonetree, after becoming romantically involved with a Soviet embassy worker, told investigators he allowed the woman and her "uncle" to tour the embassy at night. How romantic.

Other Marines have been seen frequenting hotels with prostitutes assumed to be working with the KGB secret police and sleeping with Soviet embassy maids.

These are probably the most expensive prostitutes ever hired, and the nation will be paying the bill over the next several years. Investigators said Monday that embassy security has been "fully compromised" and estimated it would cost tens of millions of dollars to rectify.

Maybe it is too big of a security risk to employ Soviet women as part of the embassy staff, but if it is it's only because the Marines can't keep their pants on long enough to do their job.

Non-smoking proposal addresses rights of all

Take heart, non-smokers.

Under a bill passed by the Kansas House that is awaiting Gov. Mike Hayden's signature, smoking will be allowed only in designated areas of retail stores, restaurants and public buildings in the state. This legislation is appropriate.

There is definitive medical support to the contention that second-hand smoke is a health hazard and because of that, non-smokers should not be subjected to annoying smoke. It's as much a right not to be forced to breathe smoke as it is to actually puff on a cigarette.

Because the smoking issue involves a clash of rights, there has been an unprecedented social and legal debate surrounding the issue. The proposal endorsed by the House successfully addresses the issue, and neither side is unfairly imposed upon.

It's unfortunate that legislation is needed to solve what common courtesy has not. Nonetheless, Hayden should legitimize the need for this piece of legislation by signing it.

Dear Rev. Bakker:

Please forgive my horrible sins

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

Dear Rev. Bakker,

I know you are a busy man, what with press conferences, church services, personal conversations with God and most importantly, business meetings with the Rev. Falwell, but I am writing to confess one of my sins to you. (I tried to reach you by phone, but your secretary said you were "all tied up." I am unsure what she meant by this, but I decided to write a letter as I could barely hear her over what sounded like a hot tub.)

Anyway, before I begin my confession, I should warn you that what I am about to confess is far worse, I think, than anything you might have done with Miss Hahn. I'm not talking about private, relatively harmless matters — the kind that make Dan Rather blush when he reports them on TV. No, I'm talking about terrible thought crimes against humanity — the kind Dan Rather can't even report on TV.

Anyway, here goes: As you probably know, for the past few months the Kansas Legislature has considered reinstating the death penalty and, to be frank, well, until recently I was opposed to the idea. Yes, it's true. Just last Friday when the Senate voted down the bill, I actually rejoiced in the prospect of continuing Kansas' status as a death penalty-free state. It was at this point that I realized I was wallowing in sin and debauchery.

After all, what fine, upstanding, moral, red-blooded, God-fearing American wouldn't be in favor of killing someone? Why, when I thought seriously about my opposition to the death penalty, I became so ashamed of my secular humanist, heathan, evil, pinko, un-American, cowardly type behavior that I wrote you this letter to ask forgiveness.

I know what you are probably thinking — that maybe I grew up in a bad neighborhood or lacked a strong fatherly figure as a child, but that simply wasn't the case. In fact, I grew up in the Leavenworth-Lansing area where there are no fewer than five correctional institutions, including the Kansas State Penitentiary in Lansing.

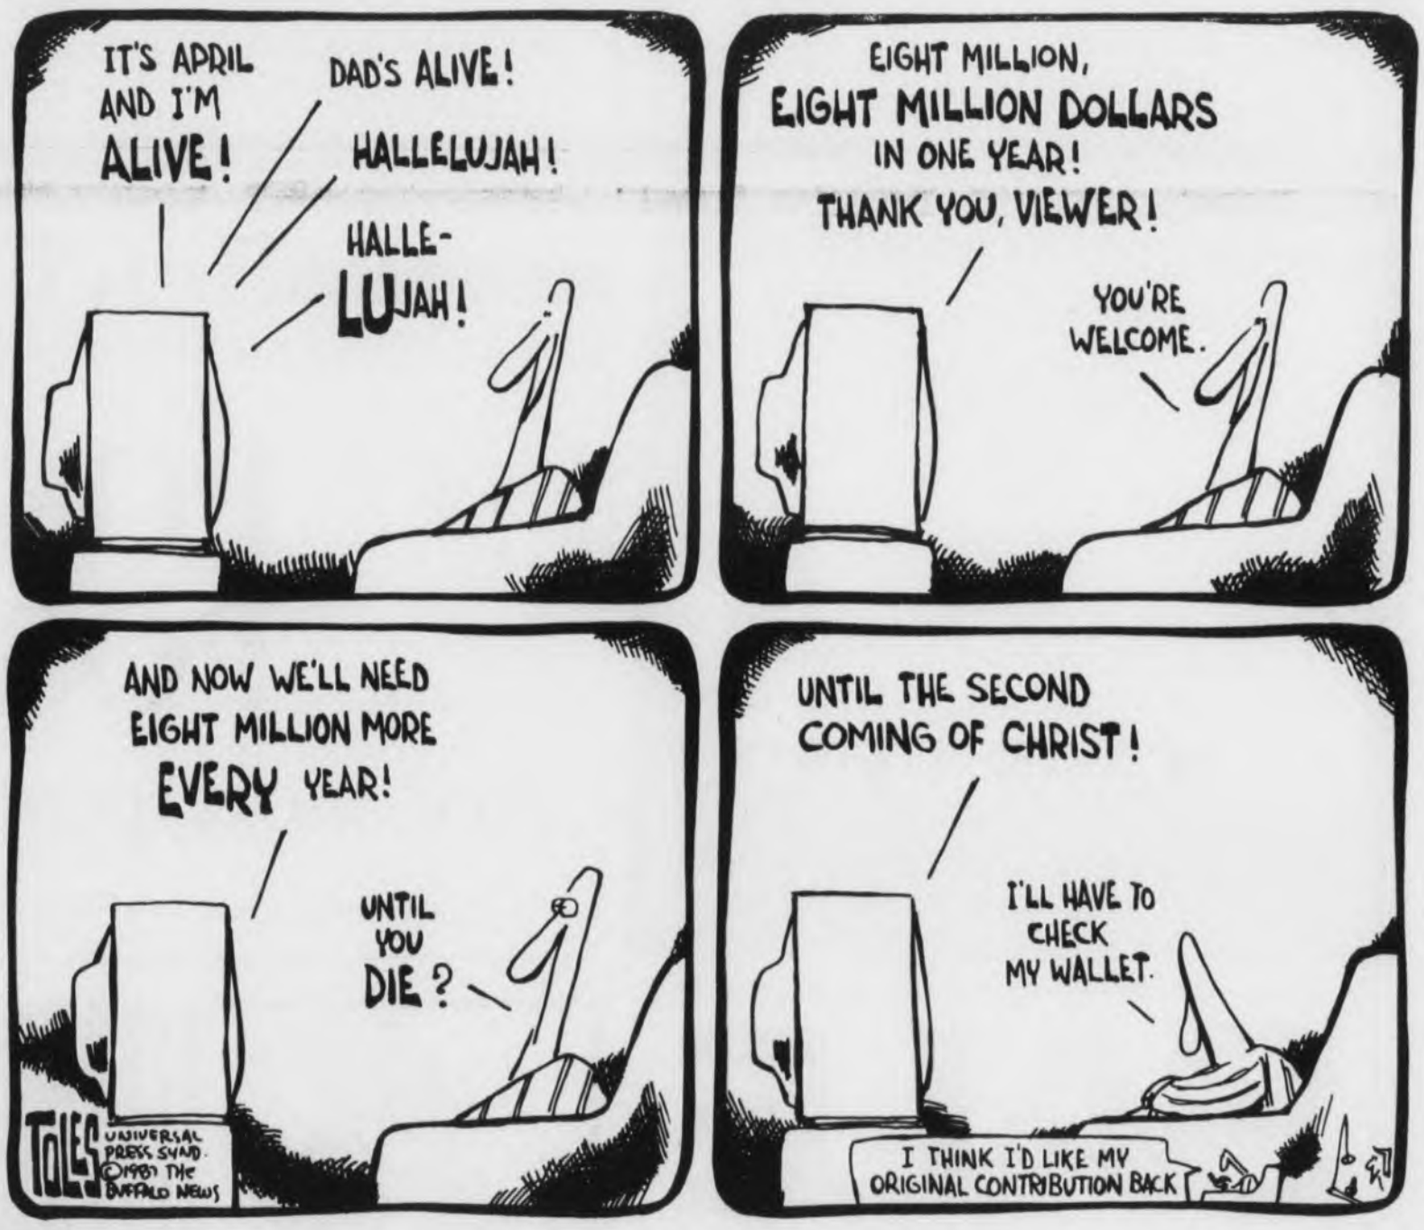
It was at KSP that criminals were hanged until 1973 when the Supreme Court declared capital punishment unconstitutional. I suspect the high court was infiltrated by communists — who else could have been diabolic enough to brainwash Americans into thinking that killing people was "cruel and unusual punishment?" Anyway, with all those penal institutions serving as monuments to our justice system, I have no doubt that I grew up in one of the most god-fearing, American communities in the country — in fact, in the whole world.

And as for good role models, I had plenty. In fact, every state representative from Leavenworth County supports the death penalty. They know it would be good for the economy; not only does it mean fewer mouths to feed, but it will create jobs as the state pours $9 million into building death row facilities at KSP. Think of all the jobs for those contractors in the community, not to mention the newly created position of syringe plunger.

No, Rev. Bakker, there is no lack of good fatherly figures in Leavenworth. There is Republican Sen. Edward Reilly, who has led the fight for the death penalty for years. It was only a few weeks ago when Reilly promised, "One way or the other, capital punishment is coming to the floor of the Senate." What a novel idea, I thought — capital punishment on the Senate floor. Maybe they could construct a gas chamber in the House chamber as well — or better yet, a guilotine.

There's also Leavenworth bank president and Rep. Clyde Graeber. He's a very good man, Rev. Bakker. It was he who pointed out, "Capital punishment is the mark of a society that holds dear the lives of its citizens." Mr. Graeber knows that to value the lives of our citizens we have to kill them.

Mr. Graeber has also said that societies which don't have the death penalty don't value life. That just goes to show, you can't trust foreigners. After all, the English don't have the death penalty, and neither do the French or Germans, or the Italians, Canadians, Norwegians, Swedes, Swiss, Austrians, Spaniards, Finns, Australians, Danish, Dutch or Japanese. On the other hand, we can trust the South Africans, the Chileans and the Iranians, although the Rooskies have the death penalty, too, and of course we can't trust them.



At any rate, the Leavenworth-Lansing area is a good place to grow up so I know I wasn't corrupted there. In fact, I think I began opposing the death penalty when I got to college and was brainwashed by bleeding heart liberals. Or was it pinko liberals? Oh yes, I remember — pinko liberals oppose U.S. foreign policy and bleeding heart liberals oppose domestic policy, so it must have been bleeding heart liberals.

Well, anyway, after last Friday when I realized the error of my ways, my life has changed for the better. I've decided to give up my secular humanist studies as an English major and join Pat Robertson's presidential campaign. After all, if Mike Hayden can get elected governor by promising to kill people, why shouldn't Robertson run the country from his TV studio?

But although my life has changed, unfortunately, some things in Kansas have remained the same. For one thing, Bob Dole is still Kansas's choice for the next president, although some of my friends think he's a little too left of center. For another thing, if Mike Hayden, Clyde Graeber and Reilly want badly enough to kill people, they will still have to buy guns like the rest of us.

Thank you for taking time out of your schedule to hear my confesion. I promise I will behave myself in the future. I hope you will, too.

Sincerely,
Scott Miller

New poll location

Editor,

After the last student body election, it was brought to my attention that K-State had a very low percent of the student vote. Only 20 percent of the student body voted in the general election and only 12 percent voted in the run-off election. I find these percentages to be rather low.

Do the students know the importance of voting, are they lazy or are they just apathetic in feeling that their vote doesn't matter? Students may not realize the importance of the offices or issues that are put forth on the ballot. For instance, our student body president and senators lobby for the University in Topeka, and our student senators were allocated approximately $700,000 last year which it was to distribute among various clubs and organizations. These two topics show the importance of getting the right people in office.

Voting can be a hassle since students can only vote in the Union, with the exception of the veterinary students who can vote at the Vet Med school. The Union is a good location for some, but what about the students who live north of campus? Voting should be easily accessible for them also.

I believe that there is a need for another polling station on the northern part of campus. Take a look at Cardwell Hall for example. It is located on the north part of campus. It accommodates many large lectures daily which means that many students will be at Cardwell every day.

Students will be right by the polls so they will have a better chance to vote. It is important for students to get involved with the University, and voting is one way in which they can.

Unfair burden

Editor,

I recently transferred to K-State and have become surprisingly shocked at the size of some of my business classes; one has 250 students. I did some research and found that the College of Business Administration has 45 students enrolled for every one FTE (full-time equivalent) instructor. Compare that to 24-to-1 in agriculture, 19-to-1 in engineering and only 7.7-to-1 in arts and sciences.

It is apparent that each student is not getting an equal share of personal instruction at K-State. To make things worse, the business college only teaches upper-level classes, classes where the size is supposed to be smaller to concentrate on your principal academic emphasis.

In order to improve the quality of education within the College of Business Adminstration, class sizes need to be lowered. The problem of large class sizes is that the student/instructor relationship is totally impersonal; the class lends itself only to lecture; tests are multiple choice; and academic honesty becomes a question with this becoming a breeding ground for cheating.

If the budget is the problem, business isn't getting its share of the pie. One out of six students is enrolled in business, but the college only gets one out of every $62 apportioned to it out of this year's budget. Is something going to be done or will the business college continue to be used to fund programs all over the campus?

Financial service may be bogus, groups say

Editor's Note: Today is the third day in a five-part series on student financial aid. Featured today is the continuation of student matching services. Thursday's presentation will be about aid debt management.

By DERON JOHNSON
Editorial Page Editor

Whether student matching services are legitimate or not is a question posed by many individuals and organizations.

Judith Berson, director of Student Financial Services at Broward Community College in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., is editor of the Florida Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators Newsletter.

Based upon studies she has seen concerning the search services, Berson doesn't believe they are worthwhile.

"It's virtually impossible to derive any benefit," she said. "My problem is that most of them are doing a lot of false advertising."

In addition, the companies' guarantees of locating sources of aid are unfounded, she said.

"That is so ludicrous," she said. "There are always people willing to jump in and rip off people when there's a need."

She said there's no legislation pending to restrict such companies, and she doubts there ever will be.

"It's free enterprise. There's very little that could stop them," she said.

Berson's primary concern is the companies' placing of advertisements in college newspapers across the country. She encourages newspapers to reject those ads.

"Just think about what these companies are making by putting a two- or three-line ad in papers," she said. "It's a good deal for them."

Sheila Hutinett, senior in journalism and mass communications and Collegian advertising manager, said it is nearly impossible to know in advance if companies submitting advertisements are truly able to offer what they advertise.

"Who are we to say 'I don't think you're legitimate,'?" Hutinett said. She said there has been no indication that companies advertising in the Collegian are bogus.

Gloria Freeland, assistant director, and advertising and marketing director of Student Publications Inc., said there are requirements to which companies must adhere before their ad is accepted for publication. One is that any mail-order company requesting money in advance must submit an example of the product the company is selling.

"We don't want to run a fraudulent ad by any means," Freeland said.

However, she emphasized the importance that people be smart consumers.

"People have to watch out," she said.

Bonnie Hardy, advertising director for the University Daily Kansan at the University of Kansas, said for the past two semesters there have been no display ads for scholarship search services. She was unsure, however, if any had contacted the Kansan.

She said requests for classifieds are dealt with in a similar manner as the Collegian in that advertisers must produce an example of what is being advertised.

"Generally, anyone who submits an ad we will run in the classifieds," Hardy said.

She said questionable advertisements are discussed by the Kansan board, which includes faculty and student members representing the advertising and news sections.

At the Indiana Daily Student in Bloomington, Ind., display advertising manager Mike Schaefer said the paper requests a copy of the product being advertised in addition to taking further steps.

"We try to call the city where the organization is located and talk to the Better Business Bureau," Schaefer said. "If it is valid, we do accept the advertising."

According to the report of the California Student Aid Commission's study, which was begun in 1982 and updated as results were received, only six of more than 40 computer search organizations maintained their own data base. The majority of the others utilized AGS' data base.

AGS has more than 100 licensees, the report stated. Because AGS is so widely used, the report was critical of licensees that look different but offer the same results because they use the same data bases.

"While the copyright of AGS appears on (the licensees') data forms, it is not obvious to the uninformed consumer which organizations use the same data base," the report stated.

The results of the Commission's study were anything but impressive. Many sources were available from the students' high schools, some were simply no longer available, many were essay contests.

"One of the...scholarships...required that recipients of $200 agree to abstain from alcoholic beverages," the report stated.

In addition, "The committee noted that the same sources appeared on most of the printouts received by the students. In fact, several students had almost identical printouts (with all of the same inappropriate sources)." Not one student received any money.

In addition to the results of the search, the report yielded the following observations of the computer search companies:

Advertising. Claims of matching students with money were not supported by the Commission's findings. In addition, advertising which stated that large amounts of aid go unclaimed was also unsubstantiated.

Although many companies use the term "scholarship" in their titles, "their advertising often defined outside sources of aid as scholarships, grants and loans."

Fees and refund policies. Fees ranged from $19-$49. The most common fee reported was $45. Although the companies guaranteed a minimum number of sources would be provided, there was no guarantee the student would receive money.

Quality of information received by students. "There...appeared to be little matching of students and aid resources."

The number of characteristics utilized by the companies varied. Some used a majority or nearly all of the available characteristics provided by students. Some used very few.

"One (student) responded that race, career goal, grade point average, work experience, student activities and hobbies were not used to match. One respondent indicated he did not know what characteristics were used," the report stated.

The report also noted that at least three post-secondary schools provided a computer search service for their students' use. One, the University of Santa Clara, conducted a survey of the students who had used the search service provided. Only two of 117 students who responded to the survey received any money. Their total was $900.

The survey revealed the following problems with the sources provided: The scholarship never existed, the scholarship no longer existed, the address was invalid, the source did not make awards to individuals, the computer mismatched data, the source required attendance at a school other than the University of Santa Clara, and the applicant had to be from a different geographical area than was reported.

"As a result of the survey, the University of Santa Clara discontinued the service."

In addition to its own report, the Commission reported the results of a similar study conducted in April 1983 at the University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign, for the Illinois Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators. The report concluded:

"From among the many scholarship search vendors currently operating, the three agencies we selected for our study differed in the number of sources they provided. Their differences were greatly overshadowed, however, by the factors they have in common, most notably their inability to match specific scholarship/grant eligibility requirements with specific student characteristics."

Questions helpful in legitimacy check

How does a student know if a national computerized scholarship search service is legitimate? A good way to start is by asking important — and possibly money-saving — questions.

The College Scholarship Service Student Advisory Committee has compiled a list of questions students should ask search companies before giving them any money. The questions include:

—If the company suggests that large amounts of aid currently are not being used, how does it document the statement?

—How many financial aid sources exist in the company's computer file? Does the company maintain its own file of sources, or does it use the file of some other company or source?

—Is there a minimum number of sources provided by the company? Are the listings in the form of scholarships, work, loans or contests? Do they include federal and state programs for which the student will be considered through the regular financial aid application process?

—How often does the company update its list of aid sources? Does the company check to confirm that the source still exists and that data concerning application deadlines and eligibility criteria are current?

—Can the student apply directly to the aid sources provided by the company, or must he or she be recommended for consideration by some other person or group? Are there application fees for the sources provided?

—How long will the student have to wait for the information? Will the list of aid sources be received before application deadlines?

—What characteristics are used to match students with aid sources?

—How successful have previous participants been in obtaining funds from aid sources identified by the company?

—Will the company refund the program fee if aid sources are incorrectly matched with the student's qualifications, if aid sources no longer exist or fail to reply to the students, or if application deadlines for aid sources have already passed when the information is received?

Leaders comment on terms of former student officials

By The Collegian Staff

The terms of former Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics, and former Student Senate Chairwoman Sally Traeger, senior in management, have included many controversial issues.

Various student government leaders have evaluated the actions of these leaders on some of these issues.

Pat Muir, junior in agricultural economics and Johnson's special projects director, said Johnson's most important contribution was communicating with the average student.

"When we went across campus and followed up after the election, you would not believe how impressed people were," Muir said. "I think he established that the (student body president) has to be a very visual figure."

Both Johnson and his cabinet members laid a lot of groundwork for 1987 Student Body President Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science, and his cabinet, said David Ott, junior in chemical engineering and Johnson's attorney general. They set precedents by prioritizing issues on campus and at the state, local and federal level, he said.

John Seitzer, junior in accounting and finance and executive assistant on Johnson's cabinet, noted that Johnson followed 1985-86 Student Body President Steve Brown.

"That was kind of difficult to come in after that," Seitzer said. "He kind of shined compared to that."

"Steven was totally different from me, so I really can't compare him to me," said Brown, senior in animal sciences and industry. "(He is) about a 180-degree turnaround, really."

One controversial issue was Traeger's handling of the non-revenue sports scholarship fee.

"Sally made a serious mistake of attempting to force the issue through Senate the night of the (SGA general) election," said Kirk Caraway, senior in political science and Faculty Senate representative from Student Senate.

Caraway said he was in the Student Governing Services office when the election committee was counting the referendum ballots. Traeger and other senators were calling senators to sponsor a bill considering the fee to be brought before Senate Thursday, he said.

Steve Ligon, senior in animal sciences and industry and Senate Finance Committee chairman, said he agreed with Traeger's attempt to discuss further the issue of obtaining funds for the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics, but she used the wrong approach.

"I don't think she was talking necessarily about a fee. I think she was talking about other ways to help the athletic department," said Debbie Fields, senior in marketing and Senate Operations Committee chairwoman.

A second controversial issue was Traeger's support of the administration's 3.8 percent fee on campus agencies.

As Senate chairwoman, one needs to know when to pursue issues and when to stop, Ligon said.

"I think that was one of the times (Traeger) should have backed off," he said.

Shelly Wakeman, junior in political science and Senate parliamentarian, said she could sympathize with Traeger's position since Traeger was the only student leader at K-State when the issue surfaced over Christmas break.

"It seems like we (student government) were about a step behind" during the decision-making process, Fields said.

Martin Monto, senior in sociology and Senate vice chairman, said the agencies will have to raise prices to keep their services.

"I decided I would rather pay a nickel more for a Coke than have academic programs cut," Wakeman said.

A third controversial issue was Johnson's veto of the Senate representation enhancement referendum.

"I saw real support of the veto in (the) lack of people signing the petition" to bring the issue to referendum, said Mike Riley, senior in political science and Senate State and Community Affairs Committee chairman.

Looking into other options of changing Senate representation was important, and the bill brought before Senate didn't show enough research had been done, Fields said.

"Everyone wasn't sure how representation should be handled," said Mike Kadel, senior in bakery science and agricultural economics and Johnson's chief of staff. For this reason, Johnson and his cabinet proposed establishing a committee to research other options, he said.

Although the issue definitely should have gone to referendum, Monto, one sponsor of the vetoed bill, said he liked the idea of establishing a committee.

Senate passes 65 mph speed limit

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — Starting May 1, Kansans could drive 65 miles per hour on rural interstate highways under a bill the Senate overwhelmingly approved Tuesday.

The Senate passed, 36-4, a measure that would give Gov. Mike Hayden the power to increase the speed limit on rural interstates to 65, effective May 1.

The change would affect about 680 miles of highways — Interstates 35, 70 and 135 and the Kansas Turnpike. Hayden already has the authority to increase the speed limit, effective in 60 days. The bill is designed to speed up the process.

The bill was a response to Congress' override last week of a presidential veto of a federal highway bill. It now goes to the House, where quick action is expected.

"I don't think this will is going to change the speed limit currently being driven," said Sen. Joe Norvell, D-Hays, during a brief debate on the measure. "I don't see any ill effects to the motorists of Kansas."

However, a few senators raised concerns that increasing the speed limit would result in more traffic deaths. Kansas Highway Patrol officials have said an additional 500-1,000 deaths will occur across the nation each year because of the increased speed limit.

Sen. Fred Kerr, R-Pratt, also reminded his colleagues why the 55 mph limit was put into effect in 1974, during the Arab oil embargo.

"I think we want to be cautious as we go about forgetting what happened in the '70s with the oil shortage," Kerr said.

Rep. Rex Crowell, R-Longton, chairman of the House Transportation Committee, said his panel could vote on the bill Wednesday. He said the full House could consider the matter before the Legislature's first adjournment, now scheduled for Saturday.

"We've already had a hearing on a similar House bill," Crowell said.

Crowell indicated House members might have a problem with the bill because it eliminates a "grace" provision in the law. Currently, a person caught speeding will not have the ticket included on his driving record if they are going up to 10 mph over the speed limit. A House proposal kept the provision.

Crowell also said the speed limit bill was "much ado about nothing," because Hayden already has the power to increase the speed limit.

"I'm sure it's not necessary, but we'll go ahead and do it because it's what the people want," Crowell said.

The Senate also unanimously passed an $11 million state employee pay plan for the fiscal year that begins July 1. The bill basically follows Gov. Mike Hayden's proposal to give state employees a 1.5 percent increase in salaries. The House provided for an effective increase of 0.75 percent when it passed the measure last month.

The bill now goes to the House for consideration of the Senate amendments.

The Senate also approved two House-passed appropriations bills. One, which goes back to the House for consideration of amendments, would allow the Legislature and its related agencies to spend $12.3 million in the next fiscal year.

The other, which goes to Hayden, would allow 20 agencies to spend nearly $7.4 million in fees they expect to generate in the next fiscal year.

Other bills which passed the Senate Tuesday would:

—Counties would no longer receive 5 percent of the inheritance taxes collected each year under a bill which narrowly passed, 21-19.

CORN THAT GOES POP

Popcorn: fluffy snack with endurance

In 1612 French explorers found Iroquois Indians popping corn in clay pots. They would fill the pots with hot sand, throw in some popcorn and stir it with a stick. When the corn popped, it came to the top of the sand. The Indians ate popcorn in different ways and were fond of popcorn soup.

They brought the popcorn in deerskin bags to the first Thanksgiving dinner and served it to the Pilgrims, who liked the popped corn so much they served it for breakfast with cream on it.

Archeologists have found popcorn in Mexico that was 5,600 years old and still popped.

The Incas used it to decorate bodies for burial.

Today Americans use 500 million pounds of popcorn each year. People in the Midwest buy more popcorn than in any other area of the United States. Most of the corn used for popping is grown in the Midwest, too. Milwaukee and Minneapolis are the top popcorn-eating cities, followed by Chicago and Seattle.

Although one of the most underrated nutritious snack foods around, today Americans consume 46 quarts of popped corn per person each year, according to the Popcorn Institute.

Popcorn is ideal because it is low in calories, cholesterol and is sodium-free. This fluffy treat also has a high fiber content, does not cause cancer or tooth decay, and is inexpensive and readily available.

The popularity of the snack has stayed around and is considered a necessary accompaniment to a movie. Thirty to 35 percent of the sales in movie theaters are popcorn sales, and it is estimated that half of the theaters would close without popcorn profits, said Evette Hackman, consulting nutritionist at the Stevens Health Clinic in Edmonds, Wash.

In 1984 theater operators sold more than $300 million worth of popcorn — about 40 percent of the $800 million brought in by all of the snacks and soft drinks sold at movie theaters.

Although other cereal grains can be popped, corn pops the best. However, not all corn pops the same. Special varieties of corn are grown for the specific purpose of popping. These varieties pop best when their moisture content is between 13 and 14.5 percent.

Popcorn keeps best in an airtight container, refrigerated to retain its moisture content.

Gourmet brands of popcorn are more expensive, but are advertised as popping more kernels than less expensive brands.

One ancient way of popping corn was to hold an ear of corn over a fire with a stick, but a lot of popcorn was lost when it fell into the fire. Another way was to throw popcorn directly into the fire, and when it popped out, pick it up and eat it.

The oil poppers beat this method hands-down, but the traditional oil poppers have had to move over to the newer type of air poppers. The air poppers produce a better yield than other types of poppers. In an air popper, ½ cup of unpopped white corn will produce approximately 13 cups popped.

Half a cup of unpopped yellow corn in an air popper will yield approximately 14 cups popped.

In terms of nutrients per calorie, the best bet is unbuttered air-popped popcorn. Four cups of plain popcorn is only 98 calories, approximately 1 gram of fat and 6 grams of fiber.

For those who prefer adding butter and salt to their popcorn, every tablespoon of butter or margarine adds at least 100 calories, and a teaspoon of salt adds 2000 milligrams of sodium.

White and yellow popcorn without hulls are the most popular varieties. The smallest kind is called strawberry popcorn, which has red kernels and looks like small strawberries. Rainbow popcorn has red, white, yellow and blue kernels and is sometimes called calico. There is also black popcorn, but regardless of the color, all popcorn pops white.

White corn is a hybrid corn bred for flavor, said William Carter, Omaha physician.

The corn is so flavorful that it is best when popped in pure vegetable oil, using no additives, preservatives or flavor enhancers, Carter said.

For this reason, the white corn retains its quality for days after it is popped.

White corn popped in vegetable oil contains 100 calories per three cups.

Carter, Omaha physician.

Student Publications board fills executive staff positions

By The Collegian Staff

The Board of Student Publications announced executive staff positions for the summer Collegian and the 1987-88 Royal Purple after interviewing applicants Tuesday afternoon.

Chosen were Pat Hund, senior in journalism and mass communications, for the position of Collegian editor; Barry Steffen, senior in journalism and mass communications, for Collegian advertising manager; and Mindy Stubenhofer, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, as Royal Purple editor.

"Improvements can always be made, but the basic structure will remain the same," Hund said.

He said he would like to increase coverage of events around the Manhattan area because of the decrease of regular happenings on campus.

"It's going to be more relaxed, and you don't have the day-to-day stresses."

Hund said he is looking for staff members "with creative minds who are willing to do things differently. I want them to feel like they have free reins to do what they want to do, and I realize I will be responsible for what is done."

"More than any other time I can think of, there was cooperation (among the spring news staff members)," said Jonie Trued, senior in agriculture journalism and spring Collegian editor. "Staff members were initiative. Pat was one of those members of the initiative group. He will carry on in one of the best Collegian traditions we know, and that is agressive news reporting."

"I'm looking for agressive people with positive attitudes," Steffen said of the summer staff applicants. He said he wants to expand current accounts, coordinate the staff and further develop regional accounts, an idea introduced this semester.

"We've been a lot more goal-oriented this year. Barry is new on the staff this semester and it (goal-orientation) has been ingrained in him. Hopefully he'll carry that on," said Sheila Hutinett, senior in journalism and mass communications and spring advertising manager. "Barry's done really good this spring. He's enthusiastic about it. I think he'll do fine."

"I want people who know what is going on on campus or who are willing to find out what is going on," Stubenhofer said of her staff member applicants. "I want to work on production quality and also getting the photo editor more involved with all aspects of the book and not just pictures."

Staff selection for the Collegian and Royal Purple will begin immediately. Applications are available in the Office of Student Publications, Kedzie 103, and the positions are open to anyone on campus.

Advertising in the Collegian will announce the deadline for applications for all three staffs within the next week.

The Collegian will be published biweekly during the summer semester on Tuesday and Thursday.

Hund will be interviewing for the positions of managing editor, news editor, desk editors, copy editors, staff writers and photo editor.

Steffen will be screening applicants for assistant advertising manager, account representatives and graphic artists.

Stubenhofer is accepting applications for assistant copy editors, photo editor, four section editors and production supervisor.

Included in the summer production schedule is the back-to-school issue, which will be expanded this year, said Dave Adams, assistant professor and director of Student Publications Inc. This edition will be sent to new students and will be available during enrollment.

The board is scheduled to name the fall Collegian editor and advertising manager next week at its regular meeting.

Pakistani film richly entertains

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

It would hardly seem a movie about a young Pakistani and his school chum turning a failing South London laundromat into a success promises much excitement, but "My Beautiful Launderette," with that scenario, is a richly entertaining film.

Film Review

Of course there is much more going on than simply the story of the laundromat. There's also the story of cultures in conflict, of an anti-Pakistani street gang pushing around our entrepreneurs and of the conflicts within the Pakistani community itself.

Written by 29-year-old playwright Hanif Kureishi, "My Beautiful Launderette" is a wonderfully perceptive account of life in London. The young hoods who prowl the streets outside the laundromat are like the tough guys in Stanley Kubrick's "A Clockwork Orange."

Most of the movie, though, is about the Pakistani community in London. Screenwriter Kureishi is undoubtedly familiar with this environment. He gives us many different types of Pakistanis. There are the old defeated left-wingers, like Omar's father (Roshan Seth). There are the successful entrepreneurs, like Omar's uncle (Saeed Jaffrey). And there are the young Pakistanis who are dabbling in crime, like Omar's cousin.

Omar is able to cheat his cousin out of some money, so he uses this money to refurbish the laundromat. With the help of Johnny, he turns the laundromat into a neon-lit "ritz among launderettes," complete with piped-in classical music, large leafy plants and art deco paintings.

Director Stephen Frears molds these pieces of the story together with a raw visual style. Particularly impressive are the scenes with the young punks who always seem ready to lash out violently.

The movie isn't without its flaws, though. Gordon Warnecke is just too wet behind the ears. And Daniel Day Lewis (who was excellent in "A Room With a View") is never believable as a street punk.

These criticisms aside, the strength of "My Beautiful Launderette" is in the careful attention director Frears and screenwriter Kureishi give to the contrast between the Pakistani community and the violent youth gang. This allows the film a surprising amount of suspense.

Answering the bell

Fighters meet in ring

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

From Sunday night until Tuesday night, more than 40 men responded to a ringside bell in a way characteristic only to the sport of boxing. Each man's goal was to inflict punishment on his opponent, hopefully to the point of knocking him to the ring's canvas floor.

Ironically, when that same bell was sounded at the end of each bout, the hate seeming to exude from each fighter turned into a humane, deep-seeded respect. Embraces were shared between opponents as a rule after each fight, no matter what the outcome.

Boxer coordinator and Sigma Phi Epsilon member Danny Green said the hate-respect relationship between fighters is the truly distinctive part of Sig Ep's "Fite Nite."

"The thing that sticks in my mind is how they can go out there and hate each other to death before and during the fight and then the minute the fight is over, they hug each other and they're almost better friends," Green said.

One example of how adversaries evolved into associates was how semifinal heavyweight participants Bill Blasing of Phi Kappa Theta and Jerry Dixon of Sigma Phi Epsilon teamed up in hopes of defeating Pi Kappa Phi's Bill Cooper.

While Dixon defeated Greg Stone of FarmHouse in Monday's semifinal match, Blasing lost to Cooper by a decision. Blasing, wanting to help Dixon overcome the flat-footed, hard-hitting Cooper, then became Dixon's corner man and adviser.

"Last night they were fighting each other, and now they're the best of buddies like they were before the fight. That's just one thing that really sticks out in my mind," Green said.

Cooper, however, a member of the tournament champion Pi Kappa Phi boxing team, overcame Blasing's coaching and Dixon's flambouyant style to capture the heavyweight title by the judges' split decision.

Cooper, however, said amid the confusion of the brawl he wasn't sure he was the victor.

"He came in and tagged me real good, real quick. I thought he won the fight, I really did. He did really good," Cooper said.

Despite his doubts, Cooper said the ultimate decision was that of the judges.

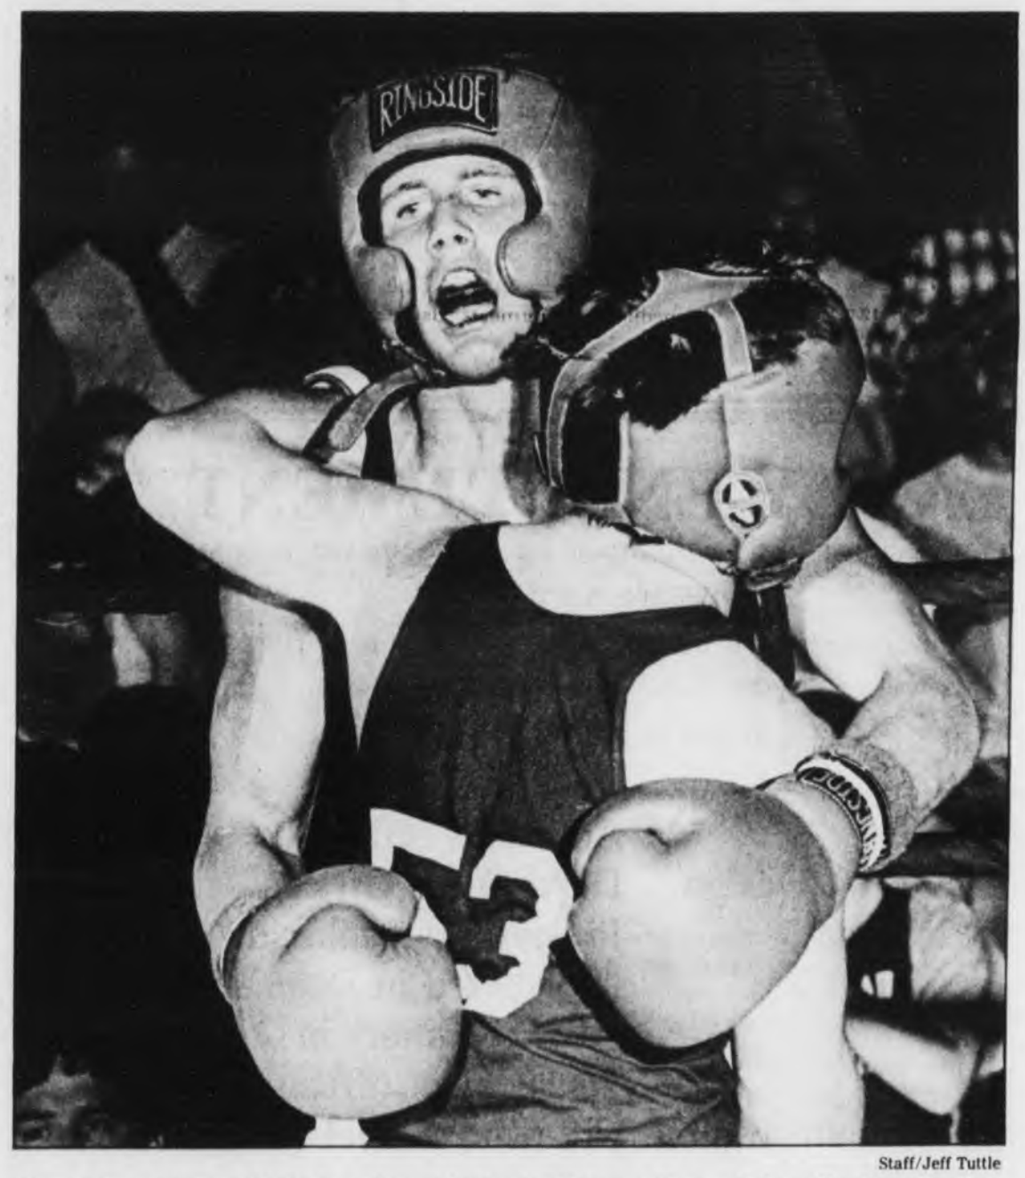
"Maybe I hit him more times than I thought. I just really didn't hit him as much as I'm used to hitting somebody," Cooper said.

Another member of the Pi Kap team, Brian Crane, became a "Fite Nite" champ for the fourth time in his four years at K-State. Crane said it felt good to win and to bring a little bit of glory to his fraternity.

"It's fun because the whole house gets involved in it once a year. It gives me recognition, plus our house doesn't do very well in intramurals so if we can do well at something, it's kind of nice. We have one of the smallest houses on campus, so it's nice to beat the big fraternities every once in a while," Crane said.

In the flyweight division, an epic battle was not fought.

While Pi Kappa Alpha twin brothers Todd and Troy Miller fought two tough rounds to get to the championship round, they said a long time ago to decide any bout between them by the toss of a coin.



That's what they did and Troy won the toss, thus taking the flyweight championship trophy home.

In the lightweight and heavy middleweight classes, the championship was supposed to be fought between two members of the same house.

Mock bouts were staged between Phi Kappa Tau lightweights Derek Duden and Sean Buffum and heavy middleweights Tim Duggan and Kris Cuchy, who are Pi Kaps. Duden and Kuchy won the comedy bouts to take their respective division titles.

Other champs included welterweight Steve Barbour, Sigma Phi Epsilon, who defeated Pi Kap Eric Zoerb; Sean Sturrock of Delta Tau Delta, who defeated Marc Montoy of Phi Kappa Tau; and Rich Debitetto of Delta Tau Delta, who defeated Steve Hardin of Alpha Tau Omega.

Hardin claimed the good sportsmanship trophy.

Boxing's been a lesson in life for Dan Hoss

The countless hours of training. The dreams and hopes of months of painstaking mental preparation and the chance to become a champion. It can all go down the drain with the referee's lift of an opponent's arm. Just ask Dan Hoss.

For Hoss, junior in journalism and mass communications, this was to be the year to avenge the loss of last year's welterweight title bout to former champion Craig Charles.

Things didn't work out the way Hoss, fighting for Sigma Phi Epsilon, had hoped. He was decisioned in Monday night's semifinal round by Pi Kappa Phi's Eric Zoerb, freshman in business administration.

Hoss said despite his disappointment, he didn't regret his commitment to box. For him, boxing has been more than a rigorous sport — it has been a lesson in life.

"The sport teaches you a lot about yourself, I feel. You learn that when it comes down to it and when it's on the line, you have to suck it up.

"I think when you're able to do that in Fite Nite — when you're able to really go after it — it makes it so much easier to really bear down and try to accomplish your goals in other areas of your life," Hoss said.

Just after spring break this year, during his training for this year's bouts, Hoss was confronted with a tough life situation. He contracted food poisoning and had to spend a week in the hospital. As a result, Hoss missed a great deal of important schoolwork, including two tests.

"When you get a lot of pressure and stress on you, you can think, 'Hey, this is nothing. I've been through this before in boxing.'

"I had that happen to me when I was in the hospital for food poisoning. I got out, and I had missed two tests and the next week I had to make up all these tests and papers, and that week I was just dying. At that point I just thought, 'I've been through something this tough before, so I can do it again,'" Hoss said.

While the physical responsibilities of training are wearisome, Hoss said the mental toughness required by boxing is also hard to obtain.

"So much of preparation for getting in the ring is mental conditioning, as well as physical. You've really got to have an edge. You've got to be really solid mentally and you have to believe in yourself. Nobody gets out there and wins thinking they're going to lose. If you picture yourself losing, you will lose, because when the fight's on the line, you won't have it in you to go after the guy," Hoss said.

The pretournament welterweight favorite also said that feeling of confidence carries over into other activities of one's life.

"If you mentally prepare yourself to win and that's all you envision yourself doing, then when it's on the line you'll do it.

"That carries over to everything you do. With tests or anything else," Hoss said. "If you've got that mental preparation, it helps you with any type of crisis you could ever come against."

Debate

"The idea behind the federal policy of encouraging compacts is that low-level radioactive waste can be better handled if states went together and pooled their resources," Kerr said. "There would be a fewer number of sites, which would be better environmentally. And superior technology could be afforded by pooling of states' resources."

Others simply said the Legislature should wait until the veto session in late April before deciding to pull out. They said Hayden's proposed task force should be given a couple weeks to explore the issue and the compact commission a chance to meet and discuss the problems with the environmental study.

"This is not the time to withdraw from the compact," said Senate President Robert V. Talkington, R-Iola. "We need to stay where we are and see what happens as a result of the governor's request for a meeting."

Here is the 18-21 vote by which the Kansas Senate rejected a proposed amendment which would have removed Kansas as a member of the Central Interstate Low Level Radioactive Waste Compact:

Republicans for (7) — Arasmith, Doyen, Ehrlich, Montgomery, Vidricksen, Winter and Yost.

Democrats for (11) — Anderson, Daniels, Feleciano, Francisco, Gannon, Johnston, Karr, Martin, Norvell, Parrish and Strick.

Republicans against (17) — Allen, Bogina, Bond, Burke, Frey, Gordon, Harder, Hoferer, D. Kerr, F. Kerr, Langworthy, Morris, Reilly, Salisbury, Talkington, Thiessen and Werts.

Democrats against (4) — Gaines, Hayden, Mulich and Warren.

Democrat present, not voting (1) — Steineger.

my homework," Hill said. "I want to make sure students are my No. 1 priority."

Current school board member Withee was reconfirmed with 15.46 percent of the vote.

Withee, who spent election day and the days leading up to it at a national school board meeting in San Fransisco, previously said she would lobby for a more challenging curriculum for the district's students.

Nichols, with 11.84 percent of the vote, was the fourth person elected to a four-year seat.

She said one of her goals would be to increase communications with the entire community.

"We need to realize 70 percent of the voters don't have children in school. They need to know what's going on," said Nichols, temporary instructor of speech at K-State.

In the race for the board's single, two-year term, Eversmeyer won with 63.76 percent of the vote compared with 36.02 percent for opponent Rudy Clarenburg.

Eversmeyer said the margin of the vote showed the public didn't take to heart the conflict of interest issue raised by her opponent over her being a teacher and board member.

"I think we needed a decisive victory to overcome the conflict of interest issue to prove if that's what the people really want, and I think we got that (Tuesday night)," she said.

Eversmeyer said it would not take long to become acquainted with the job.

"I think the first thing, of course, will be learning the ropes," she said. "For me, I don't think that's going to take very long because I've been around for such a long time that I really do know a lot about the ins and outs of the school system."

munications Services Inc., the parent company of Manhattan Cable TV Services, presented a plan that would expand Manhattan's basic cable service from 12 to 24 channels.

Theissen said the $2.2 million plan would include the replacement of more than 4,000 outside cable hookups in Manhattan and would require the installation of 31 miles of 1-inch outdoor cable to replace the three-fourths-inch cable now in use.

To fund the plan, the commission granted Manhattan Cable TV Services a 15-year extension of its franchise, which began in 1969. Manhattan Cable TV Services is partially funded by the city through the franchise.

The basic and expanded-basic subscription rates will be changed from $11.50 and $16.05 per month to a single $14.50 per month fee.

Some of the new channels that will be available to basic subscribers will be KAKE-TV in Wichita, Nashville Network, Christian Broadcasting Network, Headline News and Disney Channel.

During the meeting, commissioners declared April as Fair Housing Month. April marks the 19th anniversary of the Fair Housing Law guaranteeing equal opportunity in housing regardless of race, sex or color.

Umpire Ralph Willcott calls Otto Kaifes out at the home plate after Mike Valla, catcher for Fort Hays, put the tag on him. The Wildcats, behind the strong pitching performances from their starters, went on to win both games of the double-header.

Dominant pitching leads 'Cats to wins

By BILL LANG
Collegian Reporter

It was a do-or-die situation for K-State's depleted pitching corps in a double-header played Tuesday against Fort Hays State University at Frank Myers Field.

"We depleted our ranks down the Oklahoma series," said Wildcats' Coach Mike Clark about the fact that he used all his pitchers in the four-game series with Oklahoma.

Fortunately, K-State got two good performances from Mike Hamacher and Marty Darnell — primarily relievers — and swept the double-header from Fort Hays, 10-5 and 7-3.

K-State improved to 14-14 overall. Fort Hays dropped to 10-8-1.

"(Fort Hays) threw two good pitchers against us today," Clark said. "We didn't get started real well. We made some adjustments along the way and we made our comeback."

Hamacher, 3-1, pitched a complete game in game one. The senior left-hander surrendered a run in the third and was tagged with four more in the fourth, but pitched shutout ball the last three innings to close the game.

Right fielder Richard Lenhart was the offensive catalyst for the Tigers. Lenhart drove a 1-0 pitch over the right-field fence for a grand slam home run. The ball hit the side of Brandeberry Indoor Complex to give the Tigers a 5-0 lead.

K-State rallied in the bottom of the third inning with four runs off losing pitcher Lyle Befort, and tallied four more in the bottom of the fourth on four hits and two errors to take an 8-5 lead.

K-State catcher Jeff Turtle was in agreement with his coach that the 'Cats were sluggish at the start.

"We were a little relaxed coming out today," Turtle said. "We started hitting the spots and we just kept it up throughout the game."

In the second game, Darnell was the king of the mound as he recorded his first win of the season. Darnell, 1-0, scattered nine hits through seven innings with three strikeouts.

Fort Hays jumped out to an early advantage in the second contest, scoring twice in the second inning and once in the third to take a 3-0 lead. But Darnell allowed just four hits in the final four innings of play.

K-State got on the board in the bottom of the third inning, scoring three runs and knotting the score at 3-3. In the bottom of the fourth, shortstop Scott Spangenberg hit his first home run of the season off a 1-3 pitch from losing pitcher Ron Wilson over the right-center-field fence, giving K-State the lead.

The 'Cats added three insurance runs in the bottom of the fifth off a homer by first baseman Otto Kaifes. The homerun by Kaifes puts him at a tie for second with Greg Korbe (1975-78) in the career homer category with 23, and No. 1 in career runs batted in. Kaifes surpassed Cary Colbert (1982-84) with his 131st RBI.

Former baseball stars say prejudice evident

By The Associated Press

ATLANTA — Hank Aaron, baseball's home run king, said Tuesday that Dodgers executive Al Campanis' observation that blacks may not have all that it takes to run a major league team is an example that the game still has racial prejudice at its top levels.

Campanis, the Los Angeles' vice president of player personnel, was asked on ABC-TV's "Nightline" Monday night why there are no black field managers and few blacks in baseball management positions.

"I don't believe it's prejudice," Campanis said. "I truly believe they (blacks) may not have some of the necessities to be, let's say, a field manager or perhaps a general manager. I don't say all of them, but how many quarterbacks, how many pitchers do you have that are black?"

Aaron, now an executive with the Atlanta Braves, said, "I think Mr. Campanis is fairly intelligent, but when he makes statements like that, I think he has his head buried in the sand. He believes that blacks are not capable enough or intelligent enough to run a baseball team, and his belief is not different than any of the other owners.

"I've been hoping that things would change for the last 10 years. But I don't see any signs of hope because you still have people like Campanis with his beliefs. When you have that, blacks aren't ever going to get any place."

There now are no black managers in the big leagues.

Growing world of intercollegiate athletics requires auditing

BILL LANG
Guest Columnist

The ever-growing world of intercollegiate athletics has become a vast, complex industry involving billions of dollars.

Unfortunately, not all the financial transactions are legal.

Most high school graduates entering college are offered financial aid as a means to supplement the cost of post-secondary education. In some cases, the student athlete is unaware of the rules and falls victim to the greed of those who should know better.

In 1979, a point-shaving scheme was unearthed at Boston College. Memphis State men's basketball coach Dana Kirk left the university last fall after being brought to trial for tax evasion, and the team was put on probation for payments to athletes. A similar scandal was found at Tulane in 1985.

In February, Southern Methodist University was forced to disband its team because of slush-fund payments to players and multiple NCAA rule infractions by SMU alumni.

SMU's suspension dealt another blow to the badly bruised Southwest Conference.

With Texas Christian and Texas on probation — and Texas Tech, Houston and Texas A&M all under NCAA investigation — it could be possible that six of the SWC's nine members could be serving probations at the same time, leaving Rice, Baylor and Arkansas eligible for the Cotton Bowl berth.

Texas Gov. Bill Clements is as guilty as anyone in the SMU scandal. Clements said while he was associated with SMU, he approved payments to players while they were already on probation.

He apologized, but that doesn't remedy the situation since there are players who weren't guilty of accepting payments, but now are left without a team.

In the March 9 issue of Sports Illustrated, Mustangs' backup quarterback John Stollenwerck said, "They (the alumni) were trying to buy us a better program. They bought us no program."

Paul Harden, now the president of Drew University in New Jersey, was SMU's president in the 1970s. Harden was forced to resign because he would not tolerate violations of NCAA rules.

"When the governor of a state, who was chairman of the board of what could be great university, admits that he and others presided over a continuation of payments," said Harden, on CBS' News Sunday Morning show, March 29, "if that doesn't show that we need to weed out college athletics then I don't know what will."

St. John's University men's basketball coach Lou Carnesseca said the money involved in college athletics puts a great deal of pressure on the younger athletes.

Maryland basketball player Len Bias' cocaine-related death last June was viewed by many critics as the result of the pressure of competing in a win-at-all-costs situation.

"We should be careful that we don't use these kids," Carnesseca said. "Many of these kids cannot withstand the pressure that goes along with the game. The kids are in the formative stage of their lives...they're 18, 19, they're young."

The media is also to blame for the pressure put on the young athletes.

During an NCAA tournament game between DePaul and St. John's, CBS announcer Brent Musberger said of the Blue Demons' Dallas Comegys intentional missed free throw, "That may have been the most important shot in the history of the school."

Is the pressure applied to these athletes necessary?

Many Americans have an attitude that if you're not going to get in the race, then get the hell out of the way.

Instead of using athletes to help put a school on the map, they should be guaranteed an education and not just used to make the university money.

College athletics are big businesses, and it's time that they be audited.

Kansas hands 'Cat tennis team 7-2 loss

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

Even though the K-State women's tennis team lost 7-2 Tuesday to the University of Kansas yesterday, K-State Coach Steve Bietau said he was very happy about the team's performance.

"Atmosphere today was the best," Bietau said. "There were a lot of people here and the crowd really got into it. It was a really good battle and the people here were great. They got to see a good match."

The Wildcats, 5-7, are still looking for their first win in the Big Eight Conference where they possess a 0-3 mark. The Lady Jayhawks are 9-8 overall and 1-2 in conference play.

One of the highlights of the day was the No. 1 singles match between Kansas' Tracy Treps and Lena Svensson. Svensson defeated the defending Big Eight champion, 6-2, 3-6, 6-4.

"Lena played a great match today," Bietau said. "She has now beaten two Big Eight champions. I think she can win the whole thing.

"When I was recruiting her I saw her fight and I knew she had what it takes," he added. "She has had to fight a lot of adversity, with her knee injury, and she fought back. She's the one we want when the match is on the line."

But Svensson wasn't the only Wildcat who had a good day.

In doubles competition, K-State's No. 1 and No. 2 teams went to three sets each. The No. 1 team of Sigrid Ivarsson/Valerie Rive' defeated Treps/Jeanette Jonsson, 6-4, 3-6, 7-6 (7-2).

"Today's effort was the best I've ever seen since I've coached here in the doubles," Bietau said. "At No. 1 doubles, Tracy Treps didn't play her best, but she came alive in the third set. That's been a weak point. We've tended to back off (when a player comes alive) and today for the first time at No. 1 and No. 2 they rose to the occasion.

"They played the best tennis when it counted," he added. "Even though Annika (Emtell) and Kristy (Line) didn't win, they fought off four match points to make it close."

Emtell/Line lost 6-2, 3-6, 7-5 to Marie Hibbard/Christine Kim.

Museums' funds may be slashed

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY
Collegian Reporter

The Kansas Legislature is considering a bill that would eliminate funding to seven state-funded museums, including the Goodnow House in Manhattan, a museum honoring Isaac Tichenor Goodnow.

"The bill will probably pass," said Jeff Nelson, administrative assistant to Kansas House Majority Leader Joe Knopp, R-Manhattan. "The whole state is in tough times right now; as a result there are many state-funded programs which must be cut. There are too many expenditures for the amount of money coming in," he said.

While there are 17 state-funded museums in Kansas, only seven may lose appropriations: Goodnow House; Kaw Indian Mission, Council Grove; Highland Mission, Highland; John Brown Museum, Osawatomie; Grinter Place, Kansas City, Kan.; Pawnee Rock, Barton County; and Funston Home, Iola.

Goodnow was one of the founders of Bluemont College, which eventually became K-State.

The state wants to save money and is proposing budget cuts for these museums, said Kathleen Brown, curator of the Goodnow House.

The Goodnow House is furnished almost entirely with items preserved from the Goodnow occupancy.

Goodnow purchased the unfurnished house in 1861, and except for a few years in Neosho Falls, he and his wife, Ellen, spent the rest of their lives there.

"Goodnow was the person who went to the state Legislature and got the funding for Bluemont (College) to become Kansas State Agricultural College in 1863," Brown said. "He made a lot of contributions to the school. Goodnow's brother-in-law, the Rev. Joseph Denison, was the first president of Kansas State," Brown said.

"Goodnow was one of the first state superintendents of schools in Kansas," she said. "He was the first person to set up the public school system in the state. He set it up as we know it today."

Some features of the house are unusual, Brown said. Because Ellen Goodnow insisted on having a window centered in the south wall, it was necessary to build the chimney to curve around the window. The exposed brick visible at the back of the house shows how the work was done.

Intern stresses relaxation, exercise

By STEVE LAWRENCE
Collegian Reporter

You're late for class and the laundry isn't dry yet. Finally the laundry is done and you jump in your car. Class started 10 minutes ago.

The car won't start because you haven't changed the battery since 1973. Your next option is to ride your bike. But the bike has a flat tire, thanks to your roommate who borrowed it yesterday.

Ways to deal with stressful situations such as this were discussed by David Edgerton, psychology intern at Lafene Student Health Center. His speech Tuesday in the Union Courtyard was sponsored by the Issues and Ideas committee for Union Program Council.

Most people experience stressors 50-200 times each day, Edgerton said. To overcome stressful situations, he suggested four relaxation techniques.

The first, Edgerton called the "Four S's." A person smiles, slacks the jaw, sags the shoulders and smooths the forehead.

Another technique is deep breathing, when a person releases body tension by taking a big breath and holding it briefly before exhaling.

Abdominal breathing is the third technique. By placing one's fingers on his or her abdomen, one can concentrate on breathing correctly from the abdomen, not the chest as most people do.

The final relaxation technique is a tense and release exercise to relieve body tension. A person tenses every muscle in the body and holds that position for about five seconds before relaxing.

To carry out these techniques, people need to become more aware of situations that cause stress, Edgerton said.

"Each of us has an individual response to stress," he said.

Some of the most common signals of stress are headaches, tension in the back or neck, stomach ulcers and heart problems, Edgerton said.

All signals are the result of about 1,400 physiological changes in the body during a stressful situation, he said. A stressful experience could lead to a flee-or-fight situation in which a person must make a quick decision of whether to either stay and fight or leave and avoid the situation altogether.

"We're finally finding out that chemicals released during peak stress make us more susceptible to disease," Edgerton said. The stress breaks down the immune system and weakens its ability to fight disease.

Although stress can be harmful in most cases, it can be useful in life-or-death situations.

For example, a mother sees her son is pinned under a telephone pole knocked over by a car. The mother rushes over to help her son and lifts the telephone pole so the boy can crawl from under it.

The adrenalin rushing through the woman's body at the time of peak stress enabled her to lift an object weighing more than she would normally be able to lift, he said.

People are programmed at an early age to be stressed. When people were in second grade, he said they believed it was fun to please the teacher. But because it was important to please the teacher, it caused some apprehension to take tests, he said.

"By the time you get to college, some people get to the point of hyperventilating before a test," Edgerton said.

"We really psych ourselves up," he said. "We need to psych down."

For people who want to "psych" themselves down and eliminate stress in their lives, Edgerton suggested exercising, practicing the four stress techniques, making use of time management skills and seeking counseling at Lafene.

State officials promote multi-billion dollar nuclear device

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Kansas officials promoted the Sunflower State on Wednesday as the site for a $4.4 billion atom smasher designed to shed light on the beginnings of the universe.

Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., and Lt. Gov. Jack Walker urged the House Science and Technology Committee to endorse a U.S.-built "supercollider," saying the project was vital to advancing American high technology interests and studies in the field of physics.

Walker said it was in the "scientific and best interests" of the nation to proceed on an Energy Department site selection timetable and not to bow to the calls by some states to give them more time to submit their proposals.

"The United States cannot afford to risk further delay," said Walker.

However, he urged the panel to recommend a clarification in the department's selection criteria to ensure that states compete "on an evenhanded basis" in the site-bidding process.

One element to be considered by the government is whether states or other bidders offer financial or other incentives.

Walker warned that the "provision would be shortsighted if it acted as a bar to states which have technically superb sites, but lack the resources to outbid more affluent neighbors."

While Kansas has budgeted $50,000 for site research and planning, some states are spending millions to recruit the project.

Walker also suggested that economically depressed states should be given a preference in the selection process.

"Assuming a number of technically equivalent site bids, it would serve the best long-term interests of the nation to locate this facility in one of the states which, because it is experiencing economic transition, is least able to offer up rich incentives in the short term," said Walker.

"Indeed, such a decision would likely better serve the federal budget interests in the longer run by establishing a basis for economic transition which would enable a state or region to become less dependent upon federal subsidies in its traditional economic base."

Slattery touted the qualifications of a possible site in Kansas south of Topeka in Osage County. He said it featured stable geology, an adequate water supply from nearby Pomona Lake and ample electrical power supplies from the Wolf Creek nuclear plant and the coal-fired Jeffrey Energy Center.

The congressman also said the site provided needed regional resources of good airports and highways and it would be close to educational and research facilities at the University of Kansas. Finally, he emphasized that Kansas has the world's largest supply of helium. Liquid helium is used for cooling in existing atom smashers.

"The state of Kansas stands ready, willing and eager," said Slattery, to help scientists "answer one of the fundamental questions of our existence: What does matter consist of and how does it come into being?"

States must submit detailed bids for the project by Aug. 3, including technical, geological, hydrological, demographic and economic information.

Proposals that pass an initial screening will be reviewed by a panel of experts established by the National Academy of Sciences and the National Academy of Engineering. It will provide the government with a short, unranked list of "best qualified sites" by December.

Residents doubt water test results

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

The results are in. And though many do not intend to do so, residents of Moehlman Bottoms can now "safely" drink their water, officials say.

Tests run on water samples taken March 5 from the wells of 14 property owners living adjacent to the Riley County Landfill all came back negative late Monday afternoon, said County Engineer Dan Harden.

The only problem is that no one is allowed to see the results.

Harden said because of the Kansas Open Records Act, he could not make the test results available to the public unless the property owners gave him permission.

Wednesday, Harden said the county attorney had advised him not to show the results to anyone until he got someone "to tell us what they mean."

He said he was trying to find someone at K-State to look over the results and "translate them into laymen's terms."

Moehlman Bottoms residents are angry.

"We can't even get a set," said Corinne Glessner, a resident whose well was tested. "He said none of us could see them until a chemist goes over them."

Glessner said residents felt "pretty defeated at this point."

The Kansas Open Records Act states all public records "shall be open for inspection by any person" and that suitable facilities "shall be made available by each public agency for this purpose."

If a request for records is denied, the agency is required, upon request of the person seeking the records, to state in writing the specific provision of law under which the denial is being made. That statement must be given to the requester no later than the end of the third business day following the request for the statement.

However, the act has designated 35 categories of records that public agencies are not required to disclose.

The tests were conducted after area residents raised concerns about their water. Currently, two wells by the landfill have tested positive for carcinogens.

Senate, House pass liquor bill; governor to approve measure

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Senate sent an all-purpose bill that implements liquor by the drink and overhauls state liquor laws to Gov. Mike Hayden Wednesday.

The Senate approved, 30-10, a House-Senate conference committee's compromise that left in the bill many provisions the House had added to the measure. The bill allows for the sale of liquor by the drink in 36 counties in which voters approved a constitutional amendment in November.

It also allows for the sale of 3.2 beer on Sundays in taverns where food and non-alcoholic drinks account for 30 percent of gross sales. That provision prompted some senators to call for a rejection of the compromise.

Sen. Edward Reilly, R-Leavenworth, chairman of the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee, defended the compromise measure during nearly 90 minutes of debate, saying it not only translated voters' wishes into law but made many needed changes as well.

"It has been, without question, a hodge-podge, in terms of what we had in the statute books," Reilly said of the current liquor laws.

The House approved the compromise Tuesday, 90-33.

'Big' earthquake rocks Managua

MANAGUA, Nicaragua — A strong earthquake rocked central Nicaragua for about 35 seconds on Wednesday, but authorities said they had no immediate reports of major damage or casualties.

The government's seismological institute said it had no immediate reading on the quake, but the state radio, the Voice of Nicaragua, described it "as quite big."

The tremor was recorded by U.S. Geological Survey earthquake monitors in Golden, Colo., at a preliminary magnitude of 6.2 on the Richter scale. It occurred at 11:43 a.m. (1:43 p.m. EDT).

A news bulletin read over Managua radio said authorities had no immediate reports of anyone being killed or hurt, adding there were no reports of major damage.

The U.S. Geological Survey said the earthquake occurred off the Pacific coast of Nicaragua, centered about 60 miles southwest of Managua, and was reportedly felt in northern Costa Rica.

Myra Guillen, a secretary at The Associated Press bureau in Managua, described the earthquake as "quite, quite big." She said it started at 11:44 a.m. (1:44 p.m. EDT) and lasted about 35 seconds.

Gas tax win signals 'renaissance'

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — State leaders who urged voters to approve a 4-cent increase in their gasoline tax said Tuesday's victory marked the beginning of an economic renaissance for the state and demonstrated Missourians' common sense.

Complete unofficial returns from all 3,708 precincts showed the gas tax proposition passing 457,777 to 356,978, in stark contrast to overwhelming defeats of similar proposals in 1978 and 1982.

Sen. Norman Merrell, a Monticello Democrat who sponsored the measure, said the vote marks "the beginning of an economic renaissance for the highway system in Missouri."

Merrell said the additional money would enable the state to improve its highway system in the next decade and provide money to match millions of dollars in federal funds.

Gov. John Ashcroft, the first governor to publicly support and campaign for a gas tax measure, said that by their enactment of the new tax to provide more money for highways and bridges, Missourians had again demonstrated their "common sense."

Fugitive still eludes 225 lawmen

ROLLA, Mo. — The possible sighting of John David Brown Wednesday encouraged the 225 lawmen who have been frustrated in the 10-day manhunt through the rugged Ozark hills for the elusive fugitive.

"It's a pick-me-up," said Missouri Highway Patrol Capt. Ralph Biele. "It's a chance to say he is still here — we're not chasing a ghost."

A rural Rolla man told authorities he saw a man fitting Brown's description leading a horse through a pasture — and trying to use the animal as a cover — shortly after midnight Tuesday. He said the man bolted and ran into the woods when he was spotted.

The sighting was the first lead since a blanket believed taken in a break-in last week was found Sunday. The break-in occurred about 1½ miles from the latest reported sighting — the first since the break-in Friday.

Bronx tenement explosion kills 3

NEW YORK — An explosion flattened a grocery store and a neighboring to-story tenement in the South Bronx on Wednesday, killing three people and injuring at least 16 others. Up to seven people were feared trapped in the rubble.

Hundreds of rescuers dug through a mountain of debris with picks, chain saws and their bare hands for survivors, and cranes were called in to clear the wreckage. Dogs were brought in to help with the search.

Authorities believe the explosion at 3:45 p.m. may have occurred in the grocery store, or bodega, and triggered the collapse of the adjacent brick tenement, which was vacant except for one occupant. A utility company spokeswoman said a gas leak was reported at the bodega about 20 minutes before the blast.

One person on the street was killed; the body of a second was removed from the rubble about two hours after the explosion; and the third person died of cardiac arrest at Lincoln Hospital.

Four people were pulled from the rubble immediately, fire officials said.

FBI memo reveals North suspicion

WASHINGTON — A Justice Department official expressed suspicions as early as last October — nearly a month before public disclosure of the Iran-Contra affair — that Lt. Col. Oliver North eventually could come under criminal investigation, FBI Director William Webster told Congress on Wednesday.

Webster acknowledged reading an Oct. 30 FBI memo which outlined speculation by the Justice Department official concerning the activities of North, who was later fired from his post as a National Security Council aide at the White House.

But Webster said he had forgotten about the memo by Nov. 21, when Attorney General Edwin Meese III, declining Webster's offer of FBI help, undertook an informal inquiry into secret U.S. arms sales to Iran.

By the time the Meese probe turned into a formal criminal investigation, on Nov. 26, documents crucial to the inquiry already had been destroyed or altered, according to government investigators.

Webster made his comments at a Senate Intelligence Committee hearing on his nomination to be head of the CIA. The committee's chairman, Sen. David Boren, D-Okla., scheduled a second day of hearings for Thursday, but he and vice chairman William Cohen, R-Maine, said they had seen nothing so far that would endanger Webster's confirmation.

Casualties uncertain in plane crash

TRAVIS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — A cargo plane crashed Wednesday in an open field and burned near this northern California air base. Air Force authorities could not immediately say whether there were casualties.

Two firefighters told the Vacaville Reporter, a daily newspaper, that the plane was an L-100 transport carrying the markings of Southern Air Transport, a Miami-based charter air company formerly controlled by the CIA and involved in supplying the rebels fighting Nicaragua's government.

The firefighters, whose identities were not immediately available, told the Reporter they saw the burning aircraft.

The L-100 is a civilian version of the C-130, a four-engined propellor-driven military aircraft.

A woman who answered the telephone at Southern Air Transport in Miami Wednesday night refused to say if the plane that crashed was one owned or operated by the airline.

House votes to allow marijuana prescription

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kansas House on Wednesday accepted Senate changes in a bill that would allow the state's doctors to legally prescribe a psychoactive chemical found in marijuana.

On a vote of 124-0, the chamber accepted technical changes added to the bill by the Senate that would reclassify Dronabinol from a Schedule I controlled substance which cannot be prescribed in Kansas for any reason to a highly restricted Schedule II substance.

Supporters say research has shown Dronabinol is useful in helping cancer patients to cope with side effects of chemotherapy, such as nausea. The drug usually is administered in a tablet form and has been approved for use in a number of other states.

In Kansas, the Legislature must approve any change in the status of controlled substances. The measure advanced to Gov. Mike Hayden.

After agreeing with Senate changes, the House also sent the governor bills that would:

— Establish a system to license and regulate people who perform lie detector tests in the state. The bill establishes a five-member Kansas Board of Polygraphists, which would license all lie detector operators starting Jan. 1.

— Sets up procedures for pretrial screening panels for professional malpractice actions. The panels would determine whether there was a departure from standard job practices in lawsuits against accountants, architects, attorneys, dentists, engineers, veterinarians and a host of other professions.

Opponents argued the measure would slow resolution of those lawsuits and add the the cost of litigation.

— Allow the Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services to sell vacant land in Topeka near the Kansas River to a private developer.

Top two student leaders analyze past, look toward future

Benoit wants involvement, fair allocation

By TERESA R.TEMME
Staff Writer

Michelle Benoit, junior in agricultural economics, said she made a quick decision to run for 1987 Student Senate chairwoman, but it was the right decision.

Benoit said she decided to run for Senate chairwoman because "I was confronted by enough people who encouraged me to do it."

The idea of running for the position had been in the back of her mind for a while, so it really wasn't a one-day decision, she said.

"After the election, I was lost in what to do," Benoit said of her recent campaign for student body president, which she lost to Kent Bradley, junior in nutritional science.

Although they campaigned against each other, Benoit said she and Bradley work "surprisingly well together," adding that one reason for this could be their friendship.

"There will be issues we won't agree on, but I still enjoy working with Kent," she said.

Benoit said her one year as a senator from the College of Agriculture is sufficient experience for the office.

"A person always wishes that he or she had more experience," Benoit said, but added that serving as a senator showed her the way Senate operates.

Benoit said many of the projects she had planned to work on as student body president she can now act on as Senate chairwoman.

Benoit said she is excited to start working on improvements she stressed in her student body president campaign, such as creating a freshman council and an off-campus council.

"It is a major concern to make sure everyone is involved in one of these groups," she said.

Benoit said one of her objectives and responsibilities is to make sure the allocation process is done with careful study.

Senators really need to analyze this process to make sure they are putting the money to good use when they are allocating, she said.

Senate sometimes "gets into the rut of funding things" just because they have been funded in past years, Benoit said.

"We must make sure there is not a duplication of services," she said. "We have to be careful to allocate the money the way it needs to be spent."

To enable Senate to operate smoothly, Benoit said, it should address only the main issues. She added that little problems within the legislation should be ironed out before Senate meets.

"The work that needs to be done has to be done in committees," she said.

Benoit said things can be thoroughly analyzed in committees, and for this reason she has no problem with most of the work being completed during the committee stage.

In picking the committee chairpersons, Benoit said, "I looked for people who are dedicated to as much involvement with (Student Governing Association) as possible. It was also important to make sure that everyone has enough time to do the committee work that needs to be done."

Michelle Benoit

Preparation is essential for smooth operation of Senate, Benoit said. On Thursdays she comes into the office at 1 p.m. to make sure everything is ready for that night's Senate meeting.

Although Benoit's term will be shortened because SGA elections will be held in November, she said she feels this change in election time is beneficial to Senate. Previously, SGA elections were held in February.

Benoit said November elections will enable first-time senators to overcome the newness of their offices, and they will be familiar with the operations of Senate when they have tentative allocations of student fees in the spring.

"Because we know our term is shorter, we can work to not let it be a lame duck term," she said.

Benoit said one of her concerns is the Ad-hoc Committee on Representation established by the 1987 Senate. Benoit said she wanted enough applicants to allow for a good cross section of students.

"They will be making major decisions. They will decide if student representation can be enhanced and in what ways it can be enhanced," she said.

Benoit said 21 students have applied for the eight at-large positions and five senators for the three senator positions. She added that interviews for the positions were held Tuesday night, and Senate will vote whether to approve the resulting committee at Thursday's meeting.

"Looking over the applications, it appears that there are a lot of qualified people to pick from," Benoit said. "The committee will be looking at the issue, finding all the problems."

Benoit said the committee will be most capable of making a good recommendation because it will be examining all problems objectively and analyzing the situation before making a recommendation.

Benoit added that the committee's deadline to make a recommendation to Senate will be the end of September.

Another concern Benoit has is the lack of student feedback on campus issues.

"Senate's responsibility is watching out for student problems," she said. "It is important that we all take our jobs very seriously."

Accessibility primary goal, Bradley says

By TERESA R. TEMME
Staff Writer

Electing the candidate with the most experience in student government, not the novice, has been the usual trend in Student Governing Association elections.

But Kent Bradley doesn't consider himself a student government novice even though he did not hold a position in SGA prior to his election as student body president.

"I was involved in student government and policy in high school, and I was president of National Student Councils," said Bradley, junior in nutritional science.

He added that former Student Body President Steven Johnson, junior in agricultural economics and one of Bradley's two executive advisers, has given him valuable advice based on Johnson's experience in the legislative and executive branches of student government.

Having two executive advisers is an advantage over the usual practice of appointing only one adviser, Bradley said. The second adviser is Howard Woodbury, junior in animal sciences and industry.

Bradley said he appointed Woodbury because he showed an interest in working in the cabinet and has served as a senator.

"It doesn't cost anything to have two, and I gain a lot," he said.

Bradley said there are many new faces to student government in his cabinet this semester.

"I like this. I'm a fresh face in student government. When you gain new people you gain a new insight.

"I was looking for the best people I could get," Bradley said of his cabinet. "A broad representation was not the primary goal, but it turned out to be a whale of a cross section.

"It just happened that the sharpest people were also from a broad background."

One of Bradley's main objectives during his term in office is to increase the communication and accessibility of student government to all students.

To accomplish this personal goal, Bradley said he is trying to reach students by approaching them in their place of residence. One of Bradley's methods for meeting students is to eat at one of the residence halls each week. These encounters allow him to talk with students about student government, he said.

In addition, Bradley said he anticipates living in two residence halls during one week in the fall.

Bradley said he believes if he continues these communication methods for a long enough period of time, students will begin to tell him their concerns, and student government can act on them.

"We need to spur student's interest in what is going on," he said, adding that student government needs to find out "what is bothering students."

Kent Bradley

Bradley said he doesn't think students have a sufficient familiarity with student government, but added that students have a responsibility to educate themselves.

"We allocate their money and are spending their money. They should be very concerned," he said.

Bradley said he is spending more time out of the office than in his office. He explained it is easier to meet and talk with students if he is visible.

"Time is the biggest problem," he said. He added that he likes to visit different groups and organizations, but his tight schedule doesn't allow him to make as many visitations as he would like.

"It is easier if they arrange for me to come speak," Bradley said of group visitations. "If they give me the meeting time, it is easier for me to fit it into my schedule."

Bradley said he tries to visit other types of groups in addition to living groups by attending group meetings that are open to the public. This is a better way of meeting students that live off campus, he said.

Another project that is being looked into by Bradley is the feasibility of increasing the number of polling places on campus for SGA elections.

"Most students have to make a special trip to the Union to vote," he said. "If we increase the number of polling places, SGA will be more accessible to students."

However, he also said his cabinet is checking into past attempts at doing this because they "don't want to retrace someone else's steps that didn't work."

Small town memories ingrained forever

RON HONIG
Collegian Columnist

A few days ago I passed through the small town I have lived in all my life. Even though my days are numbered, it was not the last time I will travel through the streets, across the tracks and over the hill to leave the small rural community.

See, there will never be a last time. The town will always be a part of me and I a part of it. I may no longer walk the city's concrete paths or patronize the businesses, but the lifestyle will forever be embedded in my past. My lifestyle may change but the memories and old attitudes generated by my growing up in a rural community still remain.

I hope to travel far in my life, but no matter how far I remove myself from that little community, I hope I will always be able to return and fit in. I can see myself 10, even 20 years from now walking the gray sidewalks, stepping from square to square, avoiding the cracks. I will still meet familiar faces — faces of men who were old when I was a child and who are still around.

These men walk slowly, favoring a bad hip or succumbing to humbling arthritis. Khaki trousers would be typical for some, new striped overalls for others. They would probably have on an old dress shirt and a light jacket, even on a sunny day. I can see them in flat-healed leather shoes and almost always a cap. A silver flat-brimmed Stetson suits others better.

I would find women moving about the town, running errands and stopping now and again to greet other housewives or a gentleman friend. The younger women I would probably not know; the older ones I might recognize as the mother of a classmate.

The elderly women will look at me trying to put a face with a name or simply smile and grant me a hello. Their hair colors will have all evolved into one but the beauty will still remain. Their dresses will be modest in style, the patterns slightly out of fashion.

My town has its shops and businesses which, even though they may be slightly overpriced, make a living from people frequenting them more out of necessity than will. The stores are not fancy, just comfortable. They meet the local needs and sometimes add a touch of lace such as a new recipe at the diner or the latest household appliance in the hardware store.

I felt I knew the kids in my town until I left for a while. When I return, even today, for a ball game or similar event, I find myself wondering where all these new people came from. The high school seems full of strangers. I guess all the grade schoolers grew up. They look at me strangely, most recognizing me but ignoring me because it's their show now. I'm the intruder.

In my small town, the school played a major role. The town's people seemed to look upon the school as something special, their key to the future, the chance to succeed.

Every school has its stragglers, and mine is no exception. We have those kids who refuse to let go of high school days, those who refuse to move on despite limited opportunities available in the community.

They work for the school or perform some low-status job remaining as much in the school scene as possible, never missing a game, party or Christmas program. These people tend to be old athletes whose time ran out before they were ready, so they become team managers or grounds keepers.

The school in my town is about the only decent place for kids to meet except for a drive-in or a beer joint, the latter of which I spent more time in than anticipated by my dad; well, maybe not. The older members of the community are fortunate to have a senior citizen center for a gathering place.

They come and sit for a while, gossip or discuss current news. A low priced meal and good company are on the agenda for the day. These men and women speak of yesterday, of their day — a time when they were the talk of the town, when the world was theirs for the taking. They've passed that world on nows, passed it on to us.

Few places exist to go to from the senior center; the options are slim. For many, the next step is the elderly home. I haven't spent a great deal of time there because when I was there it wasn't enjoyable. The general atmosphere is sad. Some of the residents are as alert and with-it as ever and some only stare aimlessly and wait — wait to die.

The experiences of these people could fill many volumes but for too many there is no means of expressing themselves. Their minds and abilities have deteriorated. When they die, a piece of my town's history does also.

I may not always make it back to the small town I call home as often as I will like, but there'll be other towns. Little stops along my way. And with every gas station, bus depot or convenience store I happen to wander into, I will see the characteristics which make home towns special.

The friendliness, hospitality and innocence of a place someone just like me calls home. So when I pause to watch a session of football practice or screech to a halt to let a dog cross the street, I will feel what the people of that town feel, and I also will be at home.

Barriers facing many black women ignored

Black females have virtually been ignored by researchers and, as a result, problems inherent to black females have largely gone unnoticed.

Anne Butler, director of educational supportive services, has been looking into successful strategies for improving the academic performance and persistence rate of black females from kindergarten through high school.

Studies are either concerned with race without specifying gender or gender without specifying race. This situation is based on the assumption that females have the same experiences, regardless of race, Butler said.

Research has shown that teachers direct attention to students in varying degrees, with white males receiving the most attention and black females the least.

Forty-five percent of black females do not graduate from high school. One of the major reasons is the high pregnancy rate among black females.

Seventy percent of black families are headed by females and the median income for black women heading families is half the median income of white female family heads.

The feminization of poverty is an increasing problem. Without also looking into the separate situation faced by black females, the problem cannot be solved because only half the issue is addressed.

Solutions should be developed to help women overcome the problems that cause them to fall into poverty. However, these strategies should consider the different types of situations faced by women of different races.

Stategies are needed to help young black females continue education in spite of barriers caused by family commitments and poverty.

Eliminating acid rain new Reagan concern

The major issue facing President Ronald Reagan and Canadian Prime Minister Brian Mulroney at their recent summit meeting is what to do about acid rain and how to reduce the amount of acid rain falling in Canada.

A number of good points can result from this meeting if both sides will listen to each other. Reagan took a giant step forward by agreeing to meet with Mulroney and discuss the acid rain issue.

Mulroney said the United States must spend more than a recent proposal of $2.5 billion during the next five years on acid rain research. The United States should seriously consider more extensive research and controls on the sulfur-dioxide emissions that contribute to the acid rain problem.

As a result of this meeting, acid rain has become a political, as well as an environmental, problem. At this point it really does not matter what the classification of the problem is; the important thing is that the problem is finally being addressed and taken seriously.

Acid rain is air pollution, largely sulfur dioxide and nitrogen oxides, caused by the burning of fossil fuels. The emissions are changed chemically in the atmosphere and fall to the ground as acidic rain, snow or dry particles.

Acid rain can destroy freshwater plants and wildlife and is suspected of damaging crops and threatening human health. This is happening in America; fish are dying, forests are dying and crops are being affected.

Maple syrup producers in Quebec blame acid rain for killing forests. University of Vermont researchers have been studying a possible link between acid rain and the decline in maple syrup production this year. Preliminary research has shown airborne pollutants returning to Earth in the form of acid precipitation might reduce the maple trees' vigor, which would end up reducing production. This is just one example; a major problem does exist.

Maybe the efforts of the Canadians will open American eyes to our own nation's existing acid rain problem. We have to realize that acid rain does not fall only in Canada.

It is also destroying America's ecological system.

Regime victimizes Iraqi people

ALIREZA RAHIMI
Guest Columnist

The Western media have failed to provide a clear and complete picture of Iraq, especially concerning the Iraqi government and the ideology on which it is founded. For this reason, I will discuss some of the ideological, social, political and economic implications of the rule of the Ba'athist party in Iraq with the hope that it will contribute to a better understanding of this issue.

Currently, Iraq is ruled by Saddam Al-Tikriti who calls himself a Ba'athist. Baathism is an ideology which is based on the teaching of its founder, Michael Aflagh, who stressed a mixture of socialism and nationalism. However, nationalism, which Aflagh defined as Arabism, came to play a very important role in Baathism. According to Ba'athist teaching, the Arab nationality enjoys superiority over all others and all aspects of life should be defined in terms of nationalism. Even religion was defined in such terms, placing the Arabs "first" in Islam. This type of "racism" is contrary to the teachings of the Holy Quran and Islam.

The Ba'athist Party came into existence during the late 1940s. Since it never enjoyed popular support, it formed an alliance with other parties, such as the Communist Party of Iraq and together these two parties were responsible for the overthrow of the "Ghasem" regime in 1963. The next regime to be placed in power was that of "Aref," but it was short-lived and by 1968, the Ba'athists had gained total control of the country and installed Hassan Al-Bakr as its leader. In 1978, Saddam, who was a party man, became the official ruler of Iraq.

Under the rule of the Ba'athists, especially since Saddam came to power, thousands of Iraqis have been murdered, tortured and imprisoned. Countless others have simply vanished without any explanation. Several international organizations and institutions will testify to the "inhumanity" of the Iraqi regime. The British newspaper Guardian reported in November 1985 serious violations of human rights in Iraq.

It mentions the capture and slaughter of thousands of Kurds by the Iraqi government. Al Tiar, another British publication, reported that since 1968 more than 13 ministers and one mayor have died at the hands of the Ba'athist regime. Religious scholars and university professors have also been murdered for disagreeing with the regime.

Iraq's prisons are filled with political prisoners. Since Saddam ordered his troops to invade Iran, which marked the beginning of one of the most bloodiest conflicts in history, thousands have perished. Besides its criminal use of chemical weapons, which has been noted and condemned by the UN, the Ba'athist regime continues to bombard Iranian cities, killing thousands of innocent civilians.

Economic disaster is impending in Iraq. The economic sector is in terrible condition. At least 22 percent of Iraq's revenue is derived from agricultural goods. Agricultural activities have greatly deteriorated and not only have exports been drastically cut, but now Iraq must import foodstuffs.

The country used to produce 1.53 million tons of wheat, but in recent years this figure has dropped to 300,000 tons (1984 figure). Prior to Saddam taking charge, Iraq was an oil exporter with a surplus. At present, along with a high inflation, Iraq is one of the largest debtors, owing over $60 billion.

Its supply of foreign exchange has been reduced from $30 billion to $800 million. Industries and investment plans faltered since most of the labor force is required at the war front. Its industries are operating at 40 percent of their capacities.

This brief demonstration of Iraq's situation demonstrates the racist ideology combined with political and social oppression can result in economic ruin and societal destruction. The Iraqi people, as well as their neighbors, are being victimized by the Ba'athist regime. It is the duty of all peace-loving people to condemn the Ba'athists and their leader Saddam and vigorously write to their own government representatives and insist that no future assistance be given to this "outlaw" regime.

The students' voice

Editor,

I would like to familiarize the population of K-State with the Associated Students of Kansas. ASK is a lobbying organization of which practically every student in a Kansas university is a member.

Some of the priority issues include the work-study program, teacher/student salaries, and tuition and fee changes. ASK's purpose is to increase the awareness of these issues among students and to relate the student point of view to the Legislature in Topeka.

Besides lobbying activities throughout the legislative session, delegations from each member university meet each semester to discuss student concerns statewide and determine ASK's platform for the next session. This semester's Legislative Assembly will be Saturday at Emporia State University.

If you are interested in voicing your opinions concerning K-State or the state's university system, or if you would like to become a lobbyist for ASK, you are welcome to attend a meeting at 5 p.m. today in the Student Government Services office.

D-day: It's time to start payments on loans

Not all repayments go to original lending institutions, financiers say

Editor's Note: This is part four of a five-part series on student financial aid. Today's features include financial aid debt management. Friday will present deciphering confusing forms.

By CHAD SANBORN
Staff Writer

College is over and the grace period has just expired. It is time to repay the student loan. However, payments will probably be made to a financial institution other than the one that originally contracted the loan.

Sharon Oneal, student loan coordinator at Columbia Savings, 630 Humboldt St., said most of the institutions that make student loans do not keep them. They sell the loans, usually in packages, for two reasons.

'Students can request that another bank buy the loan, and most banks are willing to comply.'

— Sharon Oneal

"Handling the paperwork for loan repayments is very expensive," she said.

"Furthermore, it might be to the advantage of the bank to sell the loan. By selling the loan, we are liquidating some of our assets. It gives us money to put back into loan circulation. It's like buying a car, and then later it becomes to your advantage to sell it."

Tony Pizzuti, senior vice president for Bank of Norton, 108 E. Eighth St., Norton, said both institutions involved in the loan-selling transaction benefit from it.

"A bank selling its existing loans is probably low on cash. By selling loans, they get money which can be used for new loans," he said. "The bank buying the loans gets the profit from the interest."

The profit made is the interest set in the original loan. The buying institution pays only the principal to the seller-institution, he said.

Oneal said the terms of the loan are still valid no matter who owns it. However, there are regulations for all student loans, such as a $50 minimum for payments and a 10-year limit for repayment. If the original loan was drawn up incorrectly, the institution holding the loan may require the borrower to rework the loan to meet the regulations.

Banks may request higher payments, Pizzuti said. But as long as the borrower is paying back the amounts stipulated in the loan, he is not obligated to increase payment amounts.

"However, it may be in the borrower's best interest to make higher payments and pay off the loan sooner," he said.

Borrowers also have input into the transactions, Oneal said.

"Students can request that another bank buy the loan, and most banks are willing to comply," Oneal said. "It is usually to both the borrower's and bank's advantage to comply.

"If a borrower is requesting the sale, the transaction will probably make it easier for him to pay. For the bank, this reduces the possibility for default."

A borrower most likely to request a loan-sale transaction is one with loans at more than one institution, she said. Arranging to have all payments made to one institution is called "consolidation."

Pizzuti said institutions that consolidate loans pay them off rather than buy them. Then the borrower and the institution sign a new contract for the sum of the consolidated loans.

However, consolidation is possible only if the original loans total $5,000 or more, he said.

Student-loan consolidations are new to smaller institutions, Pizzuti said. Changes in federal higher education laws in October 1986, made it possible for smaller institutions to start the practice.

"Before the changes, only large institutions could consolidate. For example, Sally Mae (Student Loan Marketing Association) has consolidated for quite a while," he said.

Sally Mae is a national organization that serves as a secondary market for loans. They deal only with repayments. Their costs are covered by selling bonds to investors on Wall Street, Pizzuti said.

'Instant cash' scenario often causes problem for overextended students

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

When students need money for college, they apply for a loan. If they get a loan the first semester, they can usually get a loan for all succeeding semesters of their college careers.

Although this "instant cash" is beneficial, few students stop to consider that all the money they borrow eventually must be repaid — with interest, said Lawrence Moeder, associate director of the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

"Too many students sign up for and receive financial aid simply because it is offered to them," he said. "They don't stop to think (the loan) does involve repayment in the future."

Consequently, six months after graduation, people are often faced with loan payments they cannot afford.

To combat this dilemma, the federal government has mandated that all financial aid offices and lending institutions across the country offer some form of debt counseling to students applying for loans.

The purpose of the counseling is to let the students know the types of repayments they will have, how long they have to pay back the loan and what kind of loan payments they will most likely be able to afford after they graduate.

Although the University financial aid office will not begin official debt counseling until July, students interested in obtaining a loan now can get information from the office through Credit Wise, a computer software program specifically designed for debt management.

Credit Wise, distributed by Advanced Process Labs, assists students in determining the impact of college financial loans and the processes of repayment.

"The computer (program) helps students evaluate their ability to pay their loans," he said

Credit Wise has five mini-programs: Getting Started, Understanding a Loan, Budgeting, Credit Definitions and The Future.

The five programs focus mainly on the processes of the Guaranteed Student Loan, the most common loan for undergraduates.

Credit Wise helps the students determine their future financial standings based on approximate beginning salaries for specified professions and estimated living expenses for different parts of the country. The computer then provides an estimated breakdown of the monthly budget, including loan repayment, average living expenses and standard tax deductions.

"It (Credit Wise) lets the students evaluate their ability to pay their loan after graduation based on the type of job they will have and what area of the country they want to live in," Moeder said.

The financial aid office also provides brochures that can give students an idea of what type of loan payment to expect.

"I think we are going to increase all the information we provide so we can make students more aware of the obligation (of a loan)," he said.

The debt management counseling that begins in July will be much more extensive than what the computer offers, Moeder said.

Although specific details of the counseling have not yet been decided, large seminars, videotapes and conventional one-on-one counseling are all being considered, Moeder said.

"We are looking at (debt management) programs around the country to see how other institutions are handling it and what is available," he said.

Moeder said the debt management program will be a beneficial addition to the financial aid office in that it will help students know what to expect when they graduate, but it most likely won't deter them from getting the loans.

"Too many times the student comes to the realization that 'Yes, the debt will be there when I graduate, but I have to have the financial aid in order to get through school.'

"The student may not have much choice."

Senators to begin allocation process

By RICHARD BROADFOOT
Collegian Reporter

Student Senate will begin tentative allocations of about $250,000 in student fees to campus groups at 6 tonight in the Union Big Eight Room.

The money being allocated comes from $25.25 of each full-time student's tuition and fees and $12.20 from each part-time student's tuition and fees. All registered campus organizations may request funding.

Student Senate will hear requests for funds from the University for Man, Women's Resource Center and the Mexican American Council of Students. Further requests for funding will be heard through the end of April.

Kent Bradley, student body president and junior in nutritional science, will also seek approval for his appointment of students to the Ad-hoc Committee on Student Representation and to the Tribunal.

The ad-hoc committee was established to examine the current representation of the student body and to research any changes that could enhance representation.

The committee will consist of three senators and eight at-large members.

Bradley will nominate five students to the Tribunal, which is the highest appellate judicial court on campus. It deals with matters of interpretation of the Student Governing Association constitution on appeals from lower judicial board decisions.

Senate will continue discussion on a bill revising the SGA bylaws concerning the Kansas State Collegian. The bill states clauses in the bylaws imply SGA has control over the Collegian's content.

Senate will also hear a first reading of a bill regarding the order of succession of the student body president and the Student Senate chairperson. Currently, the SGA Constitution does not state specifically the order of succession for these posts in case of removal, death, resignation or temporary absence.

Another first reading will be a student resolution to approve a reduction of the student fee for the Fred Bramlage Coliseum.

A proposal by George Miller, vice president for administration and finance, would reduce the fee from $16.50 to $8.25 per semester for full-time students. Miller will present the proposal before the Kansas Board of Regents April 16-17 in Emporia.

Annual African Night to feature food, music

By The Collegian Staff

Due to a "tremendous support" from the community, the African Student Union will provide food, fashion, music and dance in its second annual African Night at 7 p.m. Friday in Pottorf Hall of CiCo Park.

Kaela Mulenga, graduate student in agricultural economics and a coordinator of the event, said there was such a popular response to last year's presentation that they decided to do it again.

"There will be a lot of dancing, a fashion show with colorful costumes from different African countries and cuisine from assorted countries," said Mulenga, a native of Zambia.

"We'll have an introductory song which is sung in many African countries and is the national anthem of many. The dances will be depicting some of the things that go on in an African village.

"It's difficult to emphasize all the different countries, but we hope to get across one message, an appreciation of what goes on in Africa," he said.

Tickets will be available for $5 at the door and $4 in advance today and Friday on the first floor of the Union.

There will be plenty of tickets at the door, Mulenga said.

Nuclear reactor undergoes safety alterations

By The Associated Press

RICHLAND, Wash. — Modifications being carried out today as part of a $50 million safety upgrade of the N Reactor were recommended by a scientist 20 years ago, according to newly released federal reports.

The N Reactor on the Hanford nuclear reservation is the U.S. reactor most similar in design to the Soviet Union's light-water moderated, graphite core reactor at Chernobyl. Both lack the reinforced concrete and steel containment dome found on most commercial reactors.

Six nuclear industry experts studied ways to make the N Reactor safer following the Chernobyl disaster on April 26, 1986.

Their recommendations last October incorporated many of the suggestions made by R.E. Trumble in 1966. When proposed by Trumble, the safety upgrades would have cost an estimated $1.9 million and might have helped to prevent much of the environmental contamination the reactor has produced the past two decades.

Trumble's report was among more than 400 released Wednesday by the U.S. Department of Energy. The more than 20,000 pages expand on information contained in 19,000 pages of environmental studies released in February 1986.

Trumble, a consulting engineer, worked for General Electric, then the prime contractor on the reservation for the now-defunct Atomic Energy Commission.

Steve Irish, a spokesman for UNC Nuclear Industries, which operates the N Reactor for the Energy Department, said procedural changes to mitigate the consequences of an accident have been instituted since Trumble's report.

A 1975 safety report addressed a type of accident foreseen by Trumble, but found it not to be credible, Irish said.

The N Reactor manufactures plutonium for nuclear weapons and makes steam to generate electricity. As the result of recommendations made last fall, it has been shut down since January while the safety upgrades are made.

Being implemented in the overhaul are Trumble's calls for:

— Covering a liquid waste disposal basin.

— Making the reactor's control room able to function during an accident.

— Improving the emergency recirculation cooling system.

— Ending the dumping of contaminated cooling water directly into the soil.

A key improvement is installation of equipment to monitor potentially explosive buildup of hydrogen gases.

Although the effects of hydrogen accumulation in reactor accidents were not well known 20 years ago, Trumble called for experiments to determine the amount of gases generated in an accident.

It is believed that a hydrogen explosion destroyed the Chernobyl reactor, blowing off its top and allowing radioactivity to escape into the atmosphere. The radioactive cloud circled the Earth and contaminated large areas of the Soviet Union and Europe.

"Some hydrogen will undoubtedly be generated by the contact of water or steam with hot uranium," Trumble wrote. "The rate of generation of hydrogen, initially probably rapid, is expected to fall off quickly as the hot metal is cooled by water."

The author concluded that modifications were necessary to make the reactor safe in the event of an accident involving loss of primary coolant and a delay in operation of emergency cooling systems.

In such an accident, radiation could by-pass the reactor's containment system, Trumble concluded.

Trumble calculated that a major accident at N Reactor would affect residents living within 35 miles of the facility, including the city of Richland, 26 miles southeast. That is much farther than the 10 mile zone established by the U.S. Department of Energy.

Trumble said a "lethal boundary" distance would be 8 miles. Fifty percent of people within the lethal boundary would die within 30 days.

Trumble said his proposed modification program would reduce the lethal damage zone from 8 miles to less than 0.2 miles.

Trumble also warned of potentially serious contamination of the Columbia River in the event of an N Reactor accident.

Honored economist to speak

By The Collegian Staff

Samuel Bowles, professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts, will deliver a lecture, "Capitalism and Democracy: Scarcity, Despotism and Freedom," at 7:30 tonight in Union Forum Hall. He will be the third speaker this semester in the Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs.

Bowles is the co-author of "Schooling in Capitalist America," a book which analyzes equality of opportunity and achievement in America's schools. He also co-authored "Democracy and Capitalism: Property, Community, and the Contradictions of Modern Social Thought." In this book, Bowles and his co-author, Herbert Gintis, discuss modern economic issues in philosophical and historical perspectives.

Bowles is known as a prominent controversial political economist because of his critical view of capitalist economic institutions and their limitations on social and political democracy, said Florence Snyder, instructor in interdisciplinary studies and coordinator of the series.

Bowles received his doctorate in economics from Harvard. He has taught at the Universidad de la Habana, Cuba, and served as development adviser to the government of Greece and as education officer for the government of Nigeria. He has also received several awards and honors including Fulbright distinguished visiting professorships at the University of Kyoto and Doshisha University, Japan.

Teamwork generates success, second facilities finalist says

By The Collegian Staff

The management concept of teamwork allows all people to be involved in an organization's effort for productivity, said Kenneth Rott, the second of four finalists to be interviewed for the soon-to-be-vacated position of general manager of University Physical Facilities.

"I believe people want to be part of an organization," he said. "For the most part, people want to work. I like to work in a democratic way, using the teamwork concept."

Rott toured campus Wednesday and spoke with University officials. He was present at an open interview session Wednesday morning in Union 207.

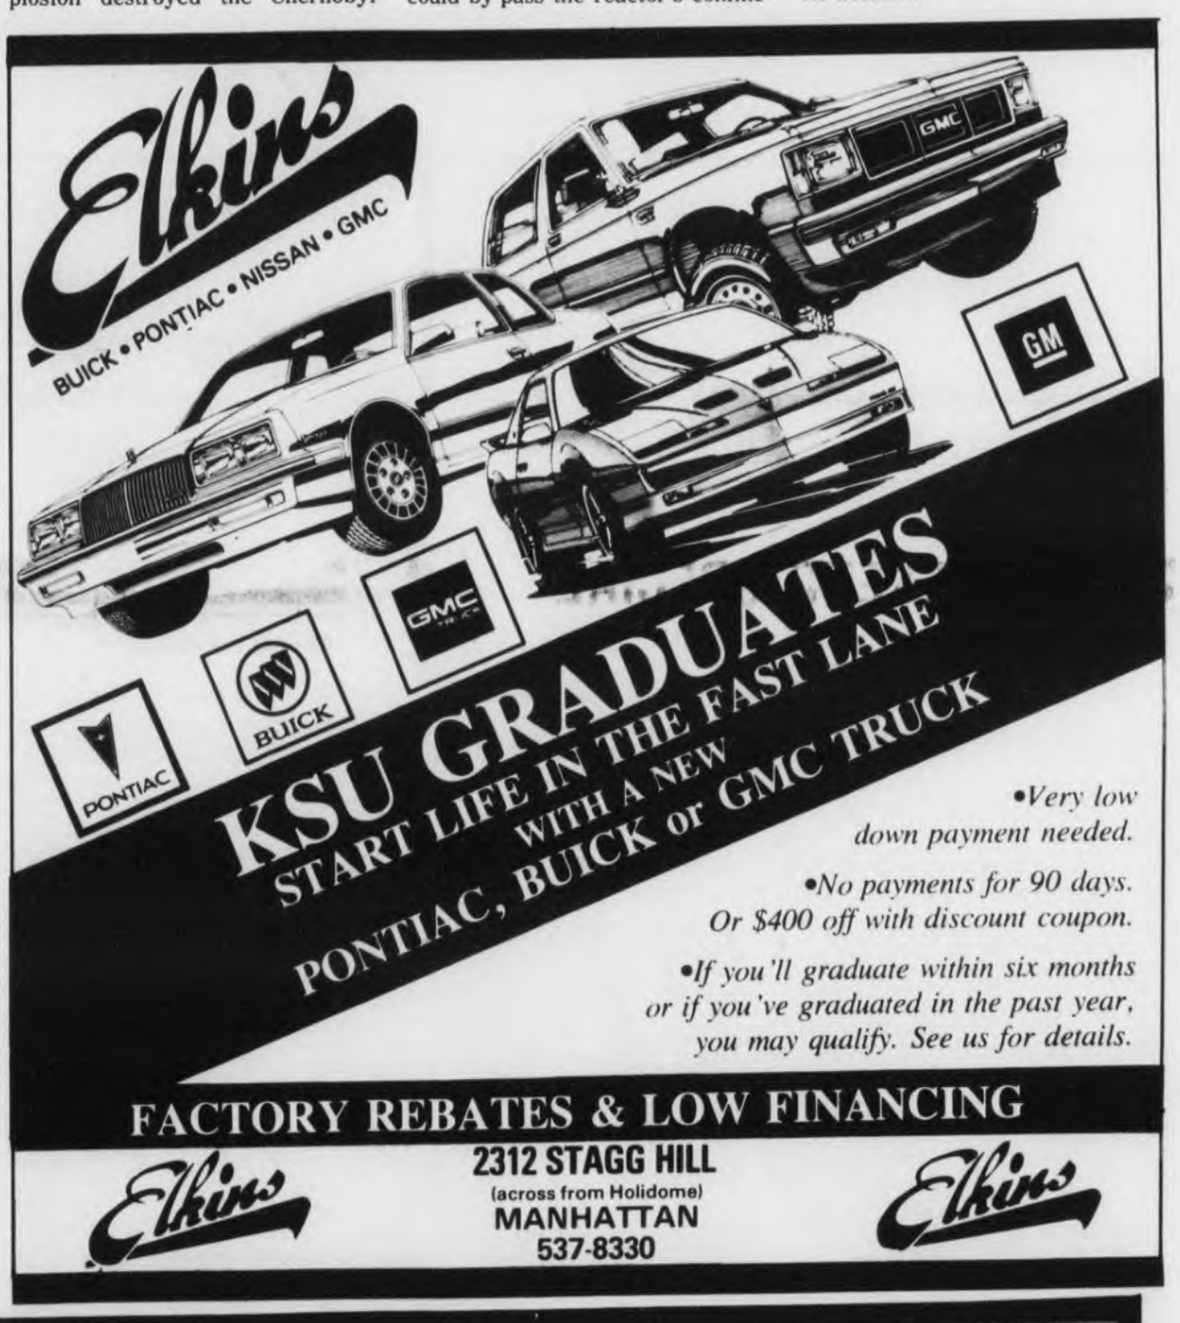
Rott said the way to handle K-State's facility problems is to "look at the buildings, see what condition they are in and see what can be done with the available funds.

"If there isn't enough money available, then I'd ask for more funding," he said.

After working as director of the physical plant at Ball State University, Muncie, Ind., for 11 years, Rott said he is ready for a change.

"K-State is similar in size to Ball State, but it has a more diversified program," he said. "I think it would be a real challenge to come work here."

Rott said all the buildings at Ball State are handicapped accessible through the use of ramps and elevators. The campus has cut curbs and bells on all traffic lights to assist the blind.



"We work with a handicap committee," he said. "We get suggestions from them about what needs to be done, and we do what we can."

The final two candidates will visit campus next week. Ronald R. Blickhahn, assistant vice president for facilities planning and management at Old Dominion University in Norfolk, Va., will have an open interview session from 9:45 a.m. to 10:45 a.m. Monday.

Edward Rice, director of the physical plant at Montana State University, Bozeman, will have an open interview session from 9:45 a.m. to 10:45 a.m. Wednesday.

Fred Ferguson, general manager of physical facilities, will retire at the end of May.

Plot, characterizations make 'Burglar' special

By ANDRE KELLEY
Collegian Reviewer

Class is now in session. Today we'll be talking about the differences between a good film and a bad one.

Using the examples of Whoopi Goldberg's "Jumping Jack Flash" and her newest release "Burglar," we'll discuss components of decent filmmaking and you will be expected to take notes.

Film Review

"Burglar" is about the antics of ex-con/robber Bernie and her crazed sidekick Carl, played by Bob Goldthwait ("Police Academy" series). They are best friends and owners of their own small businesses. All is fine until a crooked cop steps into their lives and blackmails Bernie into starting her old habits again to line his pocket.

With assistance from the cop, Bernie finds herself in the employ of a vain and crooked dentist played by Lesley Ann Warren. Her mission, since she decides to accept it, is to break into the apartment of the dentist's ex-husband and take back jewelry that she claims was stolen. Simple, right? Of course not. This is where things get sticky.

During the break-in, Bernie stumbles onto a murder (of the ex-husband) and thus becomes a suspect. She flees, but finds the jewels missing from where she had left them. Based on probable cause, and an instrument used in the killing, the dentist is arrested for the murder but leaks it to the police that Bernie was in the apartment at the time of death.

From there, the police chase Bernie; she chases three other suspects, and the audience and roommate Carl get taken along for the ride.

Unlike "Jumping Jack Flash," Whoopi is given more character to work with. Still just as salty, bold and profane as her Broadway counterpart, there's less of the wild, flashy outfits and more heart and personality.

Missing in her last flick were essential ingredients — characters and a story — that make up a solid adventure comedy. This film has both, and as far as characters go, you can't get any nuttier than Bob Goldthwait.

The man is like a cross between Pee Wee Herman and a hobo. His neurotic, raspy rantings and unpredictable, and often irritating, presence keep a lot of the energy going throughout the film.

Goldberg's forte of assuming multiple characters is a factor as well. She plays everything from an old cleaning lady to a druggie in need of a fix. She even gives a couple of convincing dramatic scenes which may eventually prove to be her best screen persona as in "The Color Purple."

The film takes off slowly, but once it gets going it'll remind you of a good episode of "Moonlighting." The story keeps you guessing; the characters keep you laughing, and there's even a clever twist in the end — unlike "Jumping Jack Flash," where the only surprise is that you don't get your money back.

It's incredible what you can do with a good script and talented cast. Maybe the rest of Hollywood can learn a lesson and stop wasting so many other comic talents like John Candy, Tom Hanks and Robin Williams.

Fortunately, Whoopi got one this time and for standard admission price, "Burglar" is a steal.

Tax deduction law causes confusion

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Only slightly deterred by confusion about a new law, taxpayers are grabbing their last chance to make a universally tax-deductible contribution to an Individual Retirement Account.

For most people, April 15 is the deadline for filing a federal tax return. It also is the last date for claiming an IRA deduction for 1986. And because of the new law, it is the last time several millions of taxpayers will qualify for the full deduction.

Through March 27, the latest figures available, 10.4 percent of all couples and individuals who had filed returns had claimed an IRA deduction, IRS spokesman Steve Pyrek said Wednesday. At the same time last year, 11 percent had taken the deduction, but for the entire year the figure was 16.1 percent.

"Some people apparently are holding back making their contribution this year because they have heard they are no longer eligible," said Don Underwood, a vice president with Merrill Lynch brokerage. "But I suspect that by April 15, there will be a rush toward IRAs because the message is becoming clear" that the old rules still apply for 1986 IRAs.

Al James Golato, chief of public affairs for H&R Block, which prepares about 10 percent of all individual returns, noted that the pace of filing returns has been down for most of the year.

On 1986 returns, any worker under age 70½ may set aside $2,000 or total earnings, whichever is smaller, in an IRA and pay no tax on that money or the interest it earns until it is withdrawn.

A two-earner couple may contribute up to $2,000 to each of two accounts. A one-earner couple is allowed two accounts totaling up to $2,250, with no more than $2,000 in either.

But for income earned this year and later, things get more complicated. As many as 6 million higher-income couples and individuals will lose the entire IRA deduction; others will lose part of the writeoff.

The new tax law creates two classes of workers for IRA purposes — those who are covered by employer pension plans and those who are not. If you are not under an employer plan, you may still make a deductible contribution of up to $2,000 a year regardless of how much you make.

If you are covered and have adjusted gross income of $25,000 or less as an individual or $40,000 or less as a couple filing jointly, you may keep a full deduction. Singles with incomes over $35,000 and couples over $50,000 get no deduction. People between those extremes get a partial deduction that falls as income rises.

Even though you may not be allowed a full deduction for your IRA under the new law, you still may make a contribution of up to $2,000 a year. That will produce no immediate tax saving, but the interest earned on the contribution will be tax-free until withdrawn.

There are no authoritative estimates of how much money is being contributed to IRAs for the 1986 tax year. But on returns filed last year, IRA contributions totaling $38.7 billion were reported by 16.4 million couples and individuals. A year earlier, 15.2 million contributed $35.4 billion.

Through 1985, IRAs had added $208 billion to the nation's pool of savings. That was an increase of 45 percent over the previous year.

The number of couples and individuals contributing to IRAs has risen steadily since 1981, when Congress liberalized the law to allow all workers — whether or not covered by a company pension plan — to make deductible contributions.

Authorities say low interest rates are causing many investors to shift more of their IRA money into stocks and mutual funds and less into the traditional certificates of deposit offered by banks, savings and loan associations and credit unions.

Underwood, the Merrill Lynch executive, estimated that half his firm's new mutual fund accounts this year are direct transfers from banks and savings and loan associations.

Officials arrest third Marine on spying

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A third Marine who worked as a security guard in Moscow and Leningrad and in the U.S. Embassy in Rome has been arrested on suspicion of espionage, causing American officials to broaden their investigations into security breaches in American diplomatic missions.

Sgt. John Joseph Weirick, 26, of Eureka, Calif., was arrested Tuesday night and held in the brig at Camp Pendleton, Calif., said Robert Sims, chief Defense Department spokesman. He is suspected of espionage while working as a security guard at the American consulate in Leningrad in 1981 and 1982, Sims said.

Meantime, as American officials sought to measure the damage caused by the infiltration of American diplomatic missions by KGB agents and electronic eavesdropping devices, there were these developments:

—FBI Director William Webster acknowledged at a Senate hearing on his nomination to head the CIA that the Soviets use their new hilltop embassy complex in Washington to intercept U.S. telephone communications. But he said he was unable to say "how much damage they are doing."

—Secretary of State George P. Shultz told reporters that Soviet eavesdropping at the U.S. Embassy in Moscow had cast "a heavy shadow" over the talks he will hold next week in the Soviet capital. He said he intended to tell the Soviets "that they can't expect to continue to create a hostile environment for our people overseas without cost to themselves."

—Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister Vladimir F. Petrovsky said the U.S. charges that the KGB had bugged the new U.S. Embassy in Moscow are "dirty fabrications" intended to spoil Shultz's trip. He accused President Reagan of making "hostile remarks."

—In Congress, bills were introduced to require the Soviets to abandon their new Washington embassy site and negotiate a new agreement with the United States. Sen. William V. Roth, R-Del., said he believed the new U.S. Embassy in Moscow would have to be torn down because it is so heavily bugged.

At the Pentagon, spokesman Sims declined to elaborate on the specific nature of the allegations concerning Weirick beyond saying that the Marine had become involved with Soviet women while posted to Leningrad.

But other Pentagon officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, said military investigators now believe that Weirick "got some money from the Russians" and "may have allowed access to the consulate; more limited than Lonetree, but access."

The arrest of Sgt. Clayton J. Lonetree in December triggered the current military investigation, which has so far led to three other arrests. Lonetree and Cpl. Arnold Bracy, who worked together as Moscow embassy guards in 1985 and 1986, have been charged with espionage.

Staff Sgt. Robert S. Stufflebeam was charged Wednesday with three counts of improperly fraternizing with Soviet women. He has not been accused of espionage, but was arrested as a result of the Lonetree probe.

Pentagon sources have said Lonetree and Bracy allegedly became involved sexually with Soviet women while working in Moscow. The women then introduced the two guards to Soviet agents, the sources said.

The Marine Corps has accused Lonetree and Bracy of allowing Soviet agents to enter the U.S. Embassy on numerous occasions and escorting them through high-security offices and communications facilities.

One source said Wednesday that Weirick's arrest indicated that the spy scandal that has rocked the Moscow security force over the past four months might really be symptomatic of a much deeper breakdown in embassy security around the world.

Sims said Weirick worked briefly at the Moscow embassy before being posted in Leningrad and later as a guard at the embassy in Rome. As a result of his arrest, the security of the Leningrad and Rome facilities is under investigation, he said.

Sims said Weirick was arrested Tuesday night at the Marine Air Station in Tustin, Calif., where he was working as a helicopter mechanic.

Although Weirick was arrested as a result of the probe of Lonetree, Sims said there was no connection between the two cases "beyond the similarity of Soviet methods."

Animals, daredevils to appear in Ahearn

By The Collegian Staff

Ahearn Field House will serve as the big top Friday when the circus comes to town.

Entertainment for children of all ages will begin at 7:30 p.m. in the annual visit of the Carden International Circus, Willard, Mo., sponsored by the local Shriner's club and K-State Block and Bridle Club.

Lions, leopards, camels and chimpanzees will entertain under the lights of Ahearn, along with two motorcycle stunt drivers who will attempt to ride inside a "Globe of Death" without colliding. The "Flying Eagles" will swing high above the crowd on the trapeze.

Previous circus performances were during the day, but this year's acts will be performed in the evening with artificial lights.

"It's going to be a lot better this year. The circus will be performing at night with more lights as part of the show," said Kenby Clawson, senior in animal sciences and industry and member of Block and Bridle.

A traditional three-ring circus with elephant rides will be available during intermission, Clawson said.

The Shrine Circus is usually in Weber Arena, but because of renovation going on in that building this year, the circus was moved to Ahearn.

Tickets are available from various Manhattan merchants and local Shrine members. Admission for children is $2.50, adults $4.50 in advance.

Professor receives fellowship funds

Benjamin Tilghman, professor of philosophy, has been awarded a full-year fellowship from the National Endowment for the Humanities.

The fellowship will provide up to $27,500 to support research and supplement University pay.

Tilghman plans to take a sabbatical in conjunction with his fellowship to write a book on the relationship between ethics and aesthetics.

Tilghman will complete part of his work in Great Britain and Norway and will also travel to Dubrovnic, Yugoslavia, to take part in a course on the philosophy of Ludwig Wittgenstein at the International University Center for Post-Graduate Studies.

Conservation scholarships awarded

Three K-State students recently received $400 scholarships from area Rod and Gun clubs.

Recipients of two Tri-County Rod and Gun Club scholarships were Nancy Smith, junior in wildlife biology, and Scott Taylor, junior in wildlife biology. The Saline County Rod and Gun Club award was given to Richard Fridell, junior in wildlife biology.

More than $17,000 has been awarded by the two conservation clubs' scholarship programs, which have been in effect for 23 years.

Kellogg Foundation grants $18,043

K-State has received a grant of $18,043 from the W.K. Kellogg Foundation to help organize a second national conference to examine how agricultural topics have been introduced into liberal arts classes.

This year's conference, to be held in Orlando, Fla., will review how faculty members have incorporated agriculture into English, political science, history and other courses since the 1984 conference.

The grants help the University give individual faculty members from the College of Arts and Sciences financial help in incorporating agriculture into their curriculum.

Established in 1930, the Foundation has given $843 million to support programs in agriculture, education and health.

1987 Miss Rodeo K-State crowned

Janette Poole, junior in agricultural journalism, was crowned the 1987 Miss Rodeo K-State Tuesday night at the Rodeo Club annual banquet.

The contest is sponsored by the Rodeo Club. The winner is responsible for helping promote college rodeo at the University and around the state.

Contestants are judged in three areas, personality, appearance and horsemanship.

They are required to model a western suit, give a three- to five-minute speech about rodeo and answer an impromptu question. Personal interviews with the judges are also part of the contest.

The modeling, speeches and interviews were conducted last week in Nichols Theatre.

In the horsemanship portion of the competition, contestants are required to manuever their horses in two ways: a reining pattern, in which participants direct the horse through a predetermined pattern; and a queen's run, which involves galloping the horse around the arena while saluting the crowd.

Competitors then trade horses and run the pattern again on a horse they haven't ridden before. Questions were also asked about horsemanship and rodeo.

"Pageants like these are not possible without three things, good contestants, good judges, and good sponsors," said Rhoda Rein, junior in agricultural journalism and 1986 Miss Rodeo K-State.

Bank center faces hard times

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

The First Bank Center at the intersection of Denison Avenue and Claflin Road is experiencing the business equivalent of survival of the fittest. Some stores in the First Bank Center succeed — some don't.

The Ritz didn't. Fred Borck, former owner of the gourmet hamburger restaurant, said although the store had some traffic when he owned it, there were problems because of the decrease in student enrollment. Borck owned the Ritz for a year and a half from the time the center opened in 1984.

Charles Hostetler, former co-owner of the center, said low student enrollment has hurt the entire business community.

"You take 3,000 people out of Manhattan, and that is a major loss to the businesses," he said.

Hostetler said he believes the University lost about 2,500 students between 1982 and 1986.

"Add (student enrollment) to the poor economy of the state, and it is bad for businesses — all businesses, not just the center.

"The situation at Denison and Claflin is not a great deal different than the entire community," he said.

Poor football and basketball teams have also affected Manhattan businesses, Hostetler said.

"We haven't had good basketball or football teams up until this year," he said. "If people don't come to the games on weekends, they don't fill the motels, restaurants or bars."

Hostetler, who built the First Bank Center in 1984 with Richard Lashbrook, said in addition to the difficulties the entire community has faced, the center has had some other problems.

"I think things should have been done a bit differently now, in retrospect," he said. "The configuration of the center, for example, poses a problem."

Hostetler said the building was designed with too much space on the second floor.

"I think if we had it to do over again we might not have put so much space upstairs," he said. "People just don't like to walk up stairs."

Sherman Sack, owner of Carol Lee Donut Shop in the center, said another problem many businesses in the center have experienced is the availability of customer parking.

Staff/Rob Squires

The Ritz is one of five businesses which have closed since the opening of First Bank Center at the intersection of Denison Avenue and Claflin Road. The center opened in 1984.

"When people come to the center and there isn't a place to park, they go someplace else," he said.

However, Hostetler doesn't agree.

"I don't think parking is a major problem. Thursday and Friday nights may be full because of Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, but 95 percent of the time there is space," he said.

Lea Roberts, owner of A Cut Above, the center's hair salon, concurred.

"If people drive up and there isn't a place to park, they can just drive around a couple of times and a space will open up," she said. "People live all around (the center) so they can walk if they want to."

A Cut Above has operated successfully for three years. Roberts said other businesses in the center have had problems because of poor management.

"Someone who knows what they're doing would have a hell of a business (in the center)," she said. "There is a tremendous amount of food traffic."

Another First Bank Center success story is Claflin Books and Magazines, owned by Ann Warren.

Warren attributes the store's success to the classy atmosphere of the store and her attempt to build public relations.

"We had a business class do a market survey to see what everyone liked and disliked about the store," she said.

Warren, who has owned Claflin Books and Magazines since May 1986, also said other businesses failed because of poor management. Some of the restaurants didn't have the right atmosphere to attract customers, she said.

Unfortunately for the successful stores, Warren said a sharp drop in business occurred when other shops closed.

"A lot of the stores closed around the same time," she said. "We are just now getting the walk-up business again."

Businesses that have closed in the center since its opening in 1984 include The Ritz, Duran's, Fountain of Youth, Pizza Hut and Pizzeria.

David Miller, officer and co-owner of Dee-Kay Developers Inc. and current owner of First Bank Center, is not worried about the success of the center as a whole.

"Real estate sometimes takes a while to develop," he said.

Cable customers to absorb 2 percent franchise tax increase

By JULIE REYNOLDS
Business/Government Editor

Editor's note: This article is a clarification of a Wednesday Collegian article about this week's city commission meeting concerning the Manhattan Cable TV Services Inc.

The Manhattan City Commission approved the first reading of a request for a 15-year franchise contract renewal for Manhattan Cable TV Services Inc. Tuesday night.

The commission also passed on first reading an increase of the city franchise tax for cable subscribers from 3 percent to 5 percent.

Commissioner Nancy Denning proposed the 2 percent increase, which will go into the city's general fund.

"The 2 percent increase will be directly passed on to subscribers, and listed on their bill as city franchise tax," said Dan Hebert, general manager of Manhattan Cable TV Services Inc.

The franchise tax is based on the cable service's gross receipts for six months at a time.

"We have to pay a percentage of our gross receipts to the city for use of streets, easements and public right of ways," Hebert said.

Manhattan Cable TV Services Inc., 610 Humboldt St., began operation in 1962 and has had two franchise renewals.

A proposed plan by the cable service, based on a survey of customers, includes an intensive replacement and improvement of the service and channels available.

The cable service will be replacing 31 miles of three-fourths-inch distribution cable with 1-inch cable. Also being replaced will be more than 150 miles of feeder network, he said. Feeder networks are branches of cable that run off the main trunking and go to residences.

This $2.2 million proposed plan also includes the replacement of 4,000 electronic tap devices. Each directional tap accommodates hookups for two to 12 subscribers in individual residences, Hebert said.

"If 12 subscribers hook up to one tap, 4,000 taps would mean 48,000 hookups," he said.

Along the trunk cables about 55 trunk amplifiers will be replaced with "state-of-the-art-amplifiers," Hebert said. The amplifiers on the trunk cable amplify the signal going through the trunk line.

A revision of cost and cable channels available is also included in the proposed plan.

The $11.55 fee for basic service with 12 channels and the $16.05 fee for basic-expanded service which includes 17 channels will be eliminated and replaced with a single basic package.

The new service would include the 17 channels and seven more channels would be added to bring the total to 24 channels, Hebert said. This new service would have a $14.50 per month fee.

The new channels included in this service will be: Headline News, Arts and Entertainment, Cable Value Network, Lifetime, Discovery Channel, Nashville Network and KAKE-TV in Wichita. The Learning Channel, in conjunction with local Channel 6, will also be included in this proposed package.

Movie channels would be available individually at $11.50 each.

"While basic-service customers will see a $2.95 increase in their bill, the expanded-basic-service customers will see a $1.55 decrease," Hebert said.

"Manhattan Cable TV Service Inc. is not partially funded by the city," he said. "We are a private enterprise and as a franchise must pay 3 percent of our gross receipts to the city's general fund."

Signing day for athletes confirms 7

By The Collegian Staff

High school seniors resumed signing college leters of intent Wednesday, opening the spring signing period, and K-State women's basketball coach Matilda Mossman hauled in the most recruits of University mentors.

Of the seven athletes signed by Wildcat coaches, Mossman landed four recruits including two players who participated in state tournaments this season.

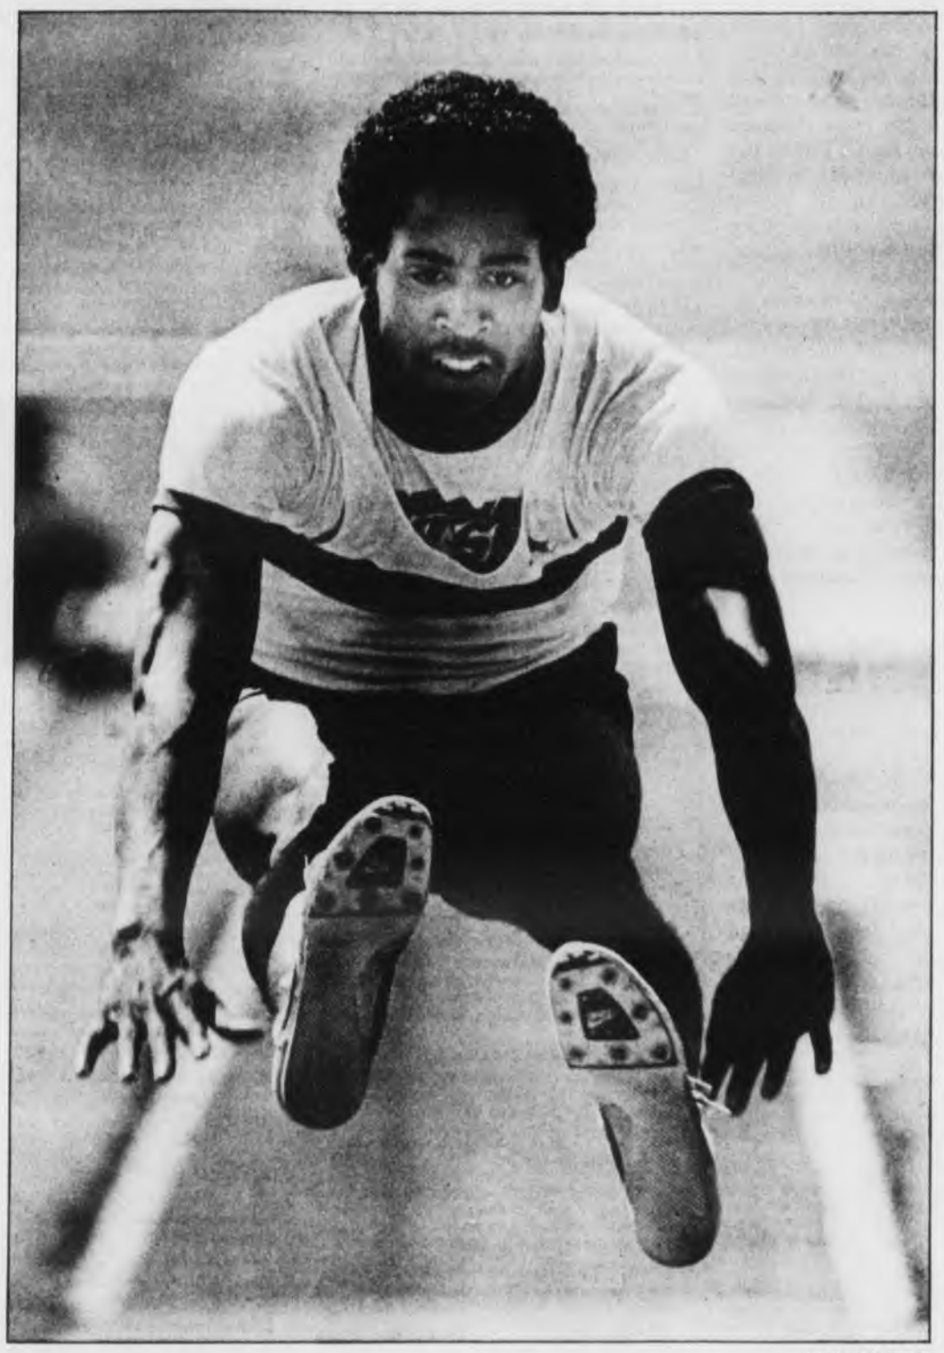
Men's basketball coach Lon Kruger picked up John Rettiger, a 6-foot-9, 210-pound center from Chase County High School in Strong City. And tennis coach Steve Bietau lured one in-state and one out-of-state recruit.

Mossman's recruits include All-Stater Diana Miller of Buhler and Tonya King of Liberal.

Miller, a 5-11 forward, averaged 23 points and 10 rebounds per game this year and led the Lady Crusaders to the Class 5A state title this season.

King, a 6-0 forward, scored 21 points and 15 rebounds per game this season and guided the Liberal girls to second place in the 5A tournament.

"Tonya may be one of the best raw athletes that we have signed his year," Mossman said. "Diana will be an impact player at either the forward or big guard positions for us."



Mossman's other signees were Stacey Boyle, a 6-2 center from Dodge City Community College and Kristie Bahner, a 5-11 forward from Topeka High School.

Rittiger, Kruger's lone signee Wednesday, averaged 21.6 points and 15.5 rebounds per outing this season and topped all scorers and rebounders in Class 3A this year.

Father's status didn't affect Switzer

Former K-State All-American Veryl Switzer Jr. has his eye on competing in the 1988 Olympics in the long jump. Switzer won the event last Saturday at the KSU-Pepsi Invitational.

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Being the child of a star athlete is seldom easy. The pressures to succeed and high expectations are inevitably prevalent and ultimately tend to act as a negative factor in a child's athletic success.

For former K-State track All-American Veryl Switzer Jr., this could have very easily been the case since he was the oldest son of former Wildcat All-American in football, Veryl Switzer Sr. But, the younger Switzer said, it wasn't that way.

"My dad didn't push me that much. He liked it when I was doing well."

The elder Switzer said when he and his wife chose to raise a family they vowed not to pressure their children into participating in athletics. Instead, they would let things take their natural course.

"We wanted to help them develop their potential...but we didn't push them," Switzer Sr. said. "I wanted them to find their own niche."

One could say, then, that it was by coincidence that Switzer Jr. found his niche in track and field.

"I remember when I used to take Veryl and (his brother) Calvin to CiCo Park to run sprints. I used to be able to outrun (Veryl) backwards, but that didn't last too long."

Now Veryl Jr., a three-time All-American long jumper for K-State in 1982-84, is training seriously for the 1988 Olympic Trials in the long jump.

"I figure that I might as well give myself a shot for '88. I'll be 26 at that time, so sure, why not give myself a shot," Switzer said.

For Switzer — whose credits include a personal record of 26-4 1/4 in the long jump, two Big Eight Conference track titles and a bronze-medal finish in the long jump at the NCAA indoor meet in '83 — this is a reasonable goal to shoot for.

To reinforce the possibility, Switzer qualified for the 1984 Olympic Trials, but was kept from participating due to a serious injury incurred to his left leg during a meet at Illinois in 1983.

"I qualified in '84 and I was hoping to do some things then, but then it didn't work out for me," Switzer said.

The extensive injury — a hamstring tendon that tore loose from the bone, a loosened posterior capsule (part of the hamstring behind the knee), and a stretched lateral collateral tendon — kept Switzer out of competition for 2½ months.

The injury was a result of a change that he and Coach Steve Miller made in his technique. They had hoped the change would increase his jumping distance past the 27-feet mark.

"I had a feeling that I could jump 27 feet," Switzer said. "What I did was, I changed my phases (in my technique) thinking that it was something that was going to help me excel."

The "changes" that Switzer made involved switching from a 1½ hitch-kick style to a 2½. Switzer made the move when he wasn't at full strength and speed, and that led to the injury, he said.

"That's the reason for the injury, but then again...we were saying that switching to the 2½ was better...it was a learning experience."

'I remember when I used to take Veryl and (his brother) Calvin to CiCo Park to run sprints. I used to be able to outrun (Veryl) backwards, but that didn't last too long.'
— Veryl Switzer Sr.

After his knee recovered, Switzer competed again in 1985 and jumped 25-9. But then he decided to take a year off to rest, take care of his knee and think about the future. It wasn't until about six months ago that he began training and working toward qualifying for the '88 Olympic Trials.

"I laid off last year and I didn't (compete at all). I think that helped my leg out a lot. I rested it (completely)," he said.

Switzer works his training around a full workday at Elkins Motors where he is a sales representative. Elkins, he said, has been very supportive and allows him to take time out during the workday to train.

This allows him to work toward his short-term goal, which is to qualify for the Olympic trials and jump in the mid- to high-26-feet range. His long-term goals are jumping in the mid-27-feet range and making the Olympic team, he said.

"I think it's going to be difficult," he said. "But I think that if you put your mind to it, you should be able to do it."

Lesser GPA levels shortchange athletes

JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

Spring has finally sprung — let's hope — and with it comes the usual barrage of warm-weather activities and rituals.

Joggers shed running tights and layer upon layer of sweats in favor of running shorts or some related item of clothing.

Levi 501s start to take a back seat to "summer clothes" that have been packed away in closets, or, if you're like me, car trunks.

This couldn't have happened soon enough for most students. The coming of warm weather in Kansas, since it doesn't usually happen until mid-April at the earliest, signals the semester is finally winding down.

Graduating seniors may panic or rejoice, depending on whether or not they have a job, while undergraduates and graduate students make summer plans and excitedly(?) enroll in summer school or classes for next fall.

For the first time this year, about 300 student-athletes will have their class schedules entered into computers Monday, the first day of pre-enrollment, regardless of grade classification.

In a March 27 Collegian article, reasons cited by University officials for allowing athletes to enroll early included "practice and competition schedules, scholarship requirements, satisfactory progress expectations, extended travel schedules and requirements not to schedule classes after 2:30 p.m."

Registrar Don Foster, in that same article, listed three reasons why K-State implemented this change.

"One is to try to better coordinate the advising of the athletes...Secondly, the athlete, in order to continue participating, must meet very stringent NCAA requirements each term...Thirdly, there are several athletic teams that travel away from campus quite a lot. Therefore, the amount of time they have to enroll is reduced because of that travel time. So they really don't have the opportunity to move between enrollment and their advisers like students normally do."

The first and third reasons cited by Foster are legitimate and justified. Student-athletes virtually give up four years of their lives to sweat, practice and compete. If they receive compensation, it is (supposed to be) in the form of a scholarship, or perhaps applause or a pat on the back for a job well done.

It is the second of Foster's reasons that is suspect. Student-athletes don't, and shouldn't, get off scot-free in this arrangement. The NCAA's "stringent requirements" mandate student-athletes complete 24 hours of degree credit every year. Additionally, they must carry a minimum GPA to maintain eligibility.

K-State to host jucos for yearly track meet

By The Collegian Staff

K-State will host the sixth annual Ward Haylett Junior College Invitational today at R.V. Christian Track. The meet will get underway at 8:30 a.m. with the women's 5,000-meter run in session No. 1.

Session No. 2 in track events begins at 11:45 a.m., and field events start at 9 a.m. with the men's javelin competition.

The meet will feature 11 area junior colleges including Garden City, Pratt, Johnson County, Cloud County, Neosho County, Barton County, Kansas City, Butler County, Northeastern Oklahoma, Hutchinson and Colby.

K-State's track teams are currently preparing for the John Jacobs Invitational Saturday in Norman, Okla. Then the following week, the teams will be in Lawrence for the annual Kansas Relays on April 17-18.

The John Jacobs Invitational, hosted by the University of Oklahoma, will feature 15 teams competing in the meet including Big Eight Conference squads from Oklahoma, Nebraska, Kansas, Oklahoma State and K-State.

'Great competition' sparks interest in quarterbacking race

By JEFF RAPP
Sports Writer

It's been quite a while since K-State's football program had a solid corps of quarterbacks to choose from. But head coach Stan Parrish is glad it's happening now.

"It's absolutely essential that we solidify that position. We knew that coming in (to the season)," Parrish said. "We knew that during recruiting without solidifying that position, we're not going to be a winner here."

Staff/Steve Wolgast

Gary Swim passed for 11 touchdowns and 1,600 yards, making Snow County Community College the top passing team in the nation in 1986.

In addition to returning senior letterman Tim Hanson, the 6-foot-1, 190-pound senior who started the team's final game last season, the 'Cats signed heralded field general Gary Swim out of Snow Community College in Utah.

Swim passed for more than 1,600 yards and 11 touchdowns in just eight games this past season, leading Snow to the top passing offense in the junior college ranks.

Adding to the more-than-welcome quarterback glut this spring are redshirt freshmen Carl Straw — listed at No. 2 in the preseason depth chart — and Chris Cobb.

"We feel we've made giant steps (in the quarterback situation)," Parrish said. "We've had great competition in practice now in the spring and we'll have that competition again in the fall.

"I think you have to continue to upgrade that position and recruit the best possible kids you can. Obviously, we're very pleased that the four scholarship athletes we have there are competing hard at that position, because it will only make us a better team."

Parrish said while Swim and Hanson have been working out with the first team offense, no decisions have been made on the order in which the quarterbacks will see action.

"The (quarterback) position is totally up for grabs," Parrish said. "We've had Tim Hanson and Gary Swim alternating with our first (offensive) group and our two redshirt freshmen Chris Cobb and Carl Straw with our second group.

"Those four have had pretty much equal turns and have had a chance to show what they can do through a week and a half of practice. So it's been pretty competitive, and I think they've all improved," he added.

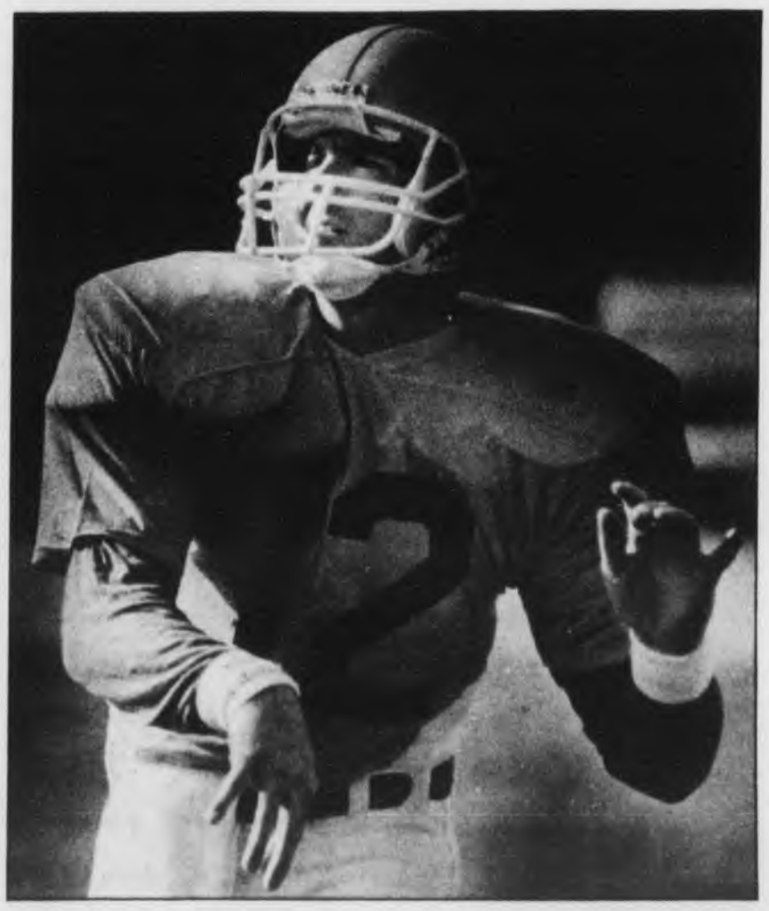
Parrish said the one who wins the starting job will have to be versatile enough to piece together his various talents.

"He'll have to have an arm, of course, because we are going to throw the ball. Maybe not as much, but we are going to throw it. But you hope they have a little bit of everything, including arm strength and anticipation and leadership qualities. Those are the three things we look for the most," Parrish said.

The second-year head coach said the 'Cats will sport a different looking offense this year. Since the attack won't be as pass-oriented, the workouts haven't been, either.

"Well, we wanted to place an emphasis on the running game to be more physical, so we've started to do that. Then, of course, our play-action passing will fall in place after that.

"In addition to that, we've put in the shotgun offense and we're throwing the ball there, but we've got a lot more balance now. We wanted to be more physical and you've got to start with the run first (to accomplish that)," Parrish said.



Parrish said he is excited about the quality and enthusiasm of his team's practices.

"We've had six really good workouts and spirited workouts with a lot of very physical hitting. I just think we're a much more physical, much more combative team right now than we were last spring or during last season," Parrish said.

Logically, Parrish said, his team must emphasize what it's best at.

"You have to build around your strengths. We have (senior tailback) Tony Jordan coming back and he's obviously a talent.

"I also think it makes your defense more physical when you bang away at them in practice every night. They become more physical, as opposed to when they have to go against themselves and you're throwing the ball every play on them," Parrish said.

Returning senior quarterback Tim Hanson started in last season's final game against the University of Colorado.

Campanis tenders resignation after controversial interview

By The Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — Al Campanis, vice president of player personnel for the Los Angeles Dodgers, has resigned after making controversial statements on national television regarding blacks in baseball, the club said Wednesday.

Dodgers' President Peter O'Malley requested that the 70-year-old Campanis resign and he did, according to club spokeswoman Mary Ann Hudson.

"Mr. O'Malley asked Mr. Campanis for his resignation," Hudson said. "He felt that the comments that were made by Mr. Campanis on 'Nightline' (Monday night) were so far removed from the beliefs of the Dodger organization that he asked him to step down.

"Fred Claire will be assuming Mr. Campanis' duties indefinitely."

Campanis has been the Dodgers' vice president of player personnel since 1968 and a member of the club's organization since 1943.

Campanis appeared on the "Nightline" show from Houston, where the Dodgers had opened their season Monday night. He was asked why there were no black field managers and few blacks in baseball positions.

"I don't believe it's prejudice," Campanis told Ted Koppel, the host of the ABC-TV show. "I truly believe they (blacks) may not have some of the necessities to be, let's say, a field manager or perhaps a general manager. So it just might be — why black men, or black people, are not good swimmers? They just don't have the buoyancy."

Tuesday night, following severe criticism regarding his remarks, Campanis apologized. He called the situation the "saddest moment in my entire career."

In the TV interview, Campanis also suggested that successful black athletes have been unwilling to stay in baseball after their playing days because of greater money offered elsewhere.

"You have to pay your dues to become a manager," he said. "Generally, you have to go to the minor leagues. There's not much pay involved and some of the better-known black players have been able to get into better fields — and make a better living in that way."

Among those reacting angrily to Campanis' remarks was Hall of Famer Henry Aaron, the leading home run hitter in baseball history.

"You have to remember that Joe Torre, Ted Williams and others didn't go to the minor leagues before managing," Aaron said. "I draw the conclusion that baseball is still somewhat prejudiced in hiring blacks as managers and front office people. I think that any blind person can see that."

Aaron, who is black, is entering his 11th year as director of player development for the Atlanta Braves.

Campanis was part of the Brooklyn organization when Jackie Robinson became the first black to play in the major leagues April 15, 1947. The first black manager was Hall of Famer Frank Robinson for Cleveland in 1975.

At present, there are no black managers or general managers in the major leagues.

Norman to seek golf's Grand Slam

By The Associated Press

AUGUSTA, Ga. — Greg Norman is a man with a mission going into the 51st Masters, the first of the year's four major tests of golfing greatness.

The free-spirited Australian who dominated world golf last year with 10 titles, has announced a quest for the unaccomplished Grand Slam, a one-year sweep of the game's Big Four professional titles.

"Greg showed last year that it is possible, that it can be done," said Jack Nicklaus, who won the Masters in dramatic fashion last spring.

Norman led through 54 holes of all four majors, the Masters, the U.S. and British Opens and the PGA last year.

He won only the British Open. But that only whetted his interest in the Grand Slam possibility.

"I think it can be done," Norman said. "I think I can do it ... Maybe this year."

To accomplish the Grand Slam he must first win the Masters.

And that is a formidable task.

He will face an elite, invitational, international field of 87, in the tournament that begins Thursday at the Augusta National Golf Club, 6,905 yards of rolling hills colored by dogwood and azalea, jasmine and wisteria, redbud and magnolia.

desire and outstanding work habits," Kruger said.

Bietau signed Theresa Burcham from Little Rock, Ark., and Miste Bitner of Bonner Springs.

Early-signing period for prep athletes was held in November with Kruger signing Carlos Diggins, a 6-4 guard from Butler County Community College in El Dorado, and Buster Glover, a 6-4 guard from Allen County Community College in Iola.

The spring signing period ends May 15.

Grades

Big Eight Conference and University standards require athletes to carry a 1.6 GPA if they have 60 hours or less and a 1.8 GPA for more than 60 hours. What a shame.

This sub-standard grade requirement cheats the student-athlete. Naturally, one hopes all K-State athletes will strive toward achieving a respectable GPA; one that will at least enable them to graduate.

University standards allow no student to graduate from this institution with less than a 2.0 GPA. So what happens to the student-athlete who cruises through four years of athletic eligibility, accumulates 96 hours and has a 1.8 GPA?

If he or she decides to return to K-State, he or she will automatically be put on academic probation. If he or she decides not to return to K-State, the University's objective "to prepare students for an occupation or a profession which includes an organized body of information and theory so they may realize their creative potential" fails.

The situations where this instance might occur are probably limited. Yet if it happens once, it can happen again.

Maybe it is time to up the GPA requirement. Maybe K-State should do something to require its student-athletes to be a notch above the rest. Early enrollment is not the important issue here — underestimating the academic potential of student-athletes is.

An Open Letter to KSU Faculty and Staff about Life Insurance

KSU KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

TEA Teachers And Employees Association

Personnel Services
Anderson Hall
Manhattan, Kansas 66506
913-532-6277

March 27, 1987

To: KSU Faculty and Staff

From: Board of Directors, Teachers and Employees Association of KSU

Subject: TEA Group Life Insurance

1. Special Enrollment Period -- March 27 to April 15, 1987.

More than 600 KSU faculty and staff currently have TEA Group Life Insurance. We want to give the rest of you the opportunity to obtain the lowest cost group life insurance available at KSU during TEA's Special Enrollment Period. Coverage for accepted new members will begin May 1, 1987.

2. TEA life insurance is often confused with KPERS life insurance.

To remove confusion we present some important facts about these two excellent life insurance programs:

-- KPERS (Kansas Public Employees Retirement System)
- is available in $5,000 increments
- is paid for by monthly payroll deduction
- is underwritten by Security Benefit Life Insurance (Topeka)
- is an excellent buy in insurance

-- TEA (Teachers and Employees Association), that's us, the other guys
- is available (for those under age 60) in two amounts, $30,000 and $50,000
- is paid for directly by the insured in one or two payments each year
- is underwritten by The Equitable Life Assurance Society of the United States
- is an even better buy than KPERS

3. Application forms and additional information.

Health and Environment had been testing the area wells, department officials decided that after identifying the problem, it was up to the responsible parties to take over the testing.

The county hired J.C. Butler Associates of Salina to conduct the tests.

"We found the water to be clean," said Jan Butler, the chemist who ran the tests. "It looks good."

Butler said her company conducted the same kinds of tests KDHE previously ran.

"It was quite a thorough list," she said. "We found no manmade pollution in this water."

Butler said one sample contained a small amount of contaminant.

"It was at the detection level of one sample and one compound, so it was certainly not significant," she said.

Harden said he was not sure what to think about the results.

One peculiarity he noticed was that the tests came back negative on the well of a resident who lives between two currently contaminated wells.

"You'd think it would be contaminated," Harden said. "I imagine it will be drawing a lot of attention."

Harden said he doubted the negative test results would affect the plans for instituting a water district for Moehlman Bottoms.

The Manhattan City Commission voted Tuesday to supply water to 49 lots in the area, and Harden said a designer is working on plans for the project.

A water district is only a short-term solution, Harden said. The long-term solution is not going to be so simple.

Most Moehlman Bottoms residents want the landfill shut down or moved. Harden said that was "clearly the right thing to do.

"The problem is that nobody wants it next to them," he said. "In most neighborhoods, people consider it a slap in the face to have a landfill put by them."

Harden said the county tried to move the landfill in 1978, but came up with too much dissent.

"It was a political buzz saw," he said. "I haven't detected any enthusiasm on the (Riley) County Commission to get rid of it."

A lack of enthusiasm seems to be the norm when it comes to the landfill. Fear of contamination has caused significant decreases in land value at Moehlman Bottoms and banks are denying home and property financing in the area.

Harden said locating the landfill on the Kansas River bottom on sandy soil was not a smart idea.

"If you want to find a crummy place to put a landfill, that's the place," he said.

Cleanup of the area will probably be up for negotiation, he said.

"Cleanup is up to KDHE," Harden said. "The only thing we can do out there is what they say."

As for the two residences with contaminated water, Harden said it was "fair game" to talk about cleaning up the homes.

"The county doesn't want to have to do any remodeling, but I think we'd be obligated to do something," he said.

Well testing will probably continue in the area, Harden said, but did not know who would conduct the tests.

"If KDHE doesn't do anything, I imagine we'll do something again," he said. "These things tend to get worse over time."

He said KDHE has taken the position that "once it's fouled up, it's fouled up."

One problem at Moehlan Bottoms is that a discrepancy exists over who is actually responsible for the contamination.

Though Riley County took over the landfill from the City of Manhattan in 1976, the city still holds the deed to the area. For that reason, both parties could be held responsible.

As of yet, no lawsuits have been filed in the matter, but many Moehlman Bottoms residents are getting angry.

"Everybody wants the landfill out of here," Glessner said.

Goodnow

fence pickets is said to have resulted in the still existing fence made of curved iron rods, Brown said. Goodnow's own scientific interests led him to build a system for circulating the air into the downstairs bedroom.

More than 6,000 people came to visit the Goodnow House last year. Brown said the number would be higher if K-State students were informed about the museum.

"I don't think many students even know the museum exists," she said.

The Goodnow House is located at 2301 Claflin Road, four blocks west of Marlatt Hall. Anyone can visit, and admission is free.

The total cost for running the museum a year is $25,000, Brown said.

"It would be a shame if the museum were shut down," she said.

Goodnow, a teacher who came to Kansas in 1855, became one of the foremost pioneer educators in the state. In 1857 he helped to purchase a site for a proposed agricultural college, which opened as Bluemont Central College in 1860 largely as a result of his efforts. He became principal of the college in 1861.

Capitalism threatens democracy's future, economist says

Staff/Steve Wolgast

Samuel Bowles, professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts, emphasizes that America must eliminate its system of capitalism to secure democracy while delivering the third Lou Douglas Lecture on Public Affairs Thursday in Union Forum Hall. Bowles said America is in an era when the people must choose between democracy and capitalism.

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

The only way to secure a democratic future for this country is to eliminate the economic system of capitalism, said Samuel Bowles, professor of economics at the University of Massachusetts, Amherst.

Bowles delivered a speech, "Capitalism and Democracy: Scarcity, Despotism and Freedom," as part of the Lou Douglas Lectures on Public Affairs Thursday night in Union Forum Hall.

Bowles said America is upon an era when the people have to choose between one of the two conflicting philosophies — capitalism and democracy — because they cannot coexist.

"The game of democracy promises equality; the game of capitalism promises inequality," he said. "The problem is the two games are being played on the same field."

Bowles said democracy guarantees civil liberties and supports the idea that people should be equally influential in the economic process. Capitalism, however, is an economic system in which goods are produced for profit by people and people are employed for wages.

"In democracy, the game is played with votes, and everyone has one," he said. "In capitalism, the game is played with dollars, and some have more than others."

The clash between democracy and capitalism is evident in the case of medical care in America, Bowles said.

"Should medical care be determined by how much the rich can pay for or what the people actually need?"

One reason capitalism was brought to America, Bowles said, is the invisible-hand philosophy, developed by Scottish economist, Adam Smith, in the 1700s.

The invisible hand refers to the way people should be lead by their own desires and not worry about others.

Smith thought capitalism and the theory of the invisible hand would destroy the Senate views coliseum plans

By RICHARD BROADFOOT
Collegian Reporter

The Fred Bramlage Coliseum may be ready for use as early as July 1, 1988 said Chales Hein, acting director of the coliseum, at Student Senate Thursday night.

Hein said in his update to Senate that construction on the coliseum is ahead of schedule and should be completed well before its original October 1988 completion date.

Included in Hein's presentation were an artist's renderings of the coliseum's interior illustrating the arena, the concourse area and the VIP seating area for KSU Stadium.

The VIP area will be located at the north end of the coliseum and will overlook the KSU Stadium. The area will be enclosed and have seating for up to 200 fans.

Hein also discussed plans for the coliseum's use upon its completion.

Hein said the coliseum, in addition to basketball, will be the site of various special events including ice shows, concerts and auto shows.

"Basketball builds the building, but special events pay the bills," Hein said.

The 13,500 seat coliseum will be home to the K-State basketball teams as well as the offices of the athletic director and basketball coaches.

Senate also passed a resolution calling for the reduction of the student coliseum fee from $16.50 to $8.25 for full-time students and from $7.50 to $3.75 for part-time students. The central administration found that by refinancing the student fee bonds it could become possible to reduce the amount of student contributions and still meet the student's share of the debt.

In other business, the Senate began tentative allocations of about $250,000 in student fees.

The Senate approved the allocation for the University for Man without debate. UFM will receive $13,133 of the $13,741 in student fees it requested for the 1987-88 school year.

The Women's Resource Center received all of its requested $748 for 1987-88. However, a recommendation by the Senate Finance Committee that WRC's request for a $300 honorarium be cut to $200 was passed. Honorarium funds are used to draw speakers to the University.

The Mexican American Council of Students was granted its request for $183.95 for 1987-88. MACS also received its request for a $600 honorarium after some debate.

Tenative allocations will resume Tuesday and continue through the end of April.

Senate also passed a bill designating the order of succession of student body president and Student Senate chairperson. The bill was originally drawn because the SGA Constitution had not specifically stated an order of succession in case of removal, death, resignation, inability or temporary absence.

Senate also approved students to the Ad Hoc Committee on Student Representation and the Tribunal.

Judge rejects charges of racism in schools

By The Associated Press

TOPEKA — All traces of segregation in the Topeka Public School District's old dual system have been "dissolved by time," and the city now has a "unitary system of education" that does not discriminate against minorities, a federal judge ruled Thursday.

In his 50-page decision, U.S. District Court Judge Richard D. Rogers rejected allegations that vestiges of racial discrimination remain in the Topeka school system.

If the decision is not appealed in 30 days, Rogers' ruling would finally signal an end to the famous Brown vs. Topeka Board of Education case which led to the historic 1954 U.S. Supreme Court decision that ended segregation in public schools nationwide.

The students and parents who filed the latest suit contended the district had not done all it could to erase the last vestiges of what once was a "separate but equal" system of racial separation. They wanted the district to be forced to do more to integrate minority students in the predominantly white school populations.

Gary Sebelius, attorney for the Topeka Unified School District No. 501 Board of Education, said his client had won the case "in toto," noting Rogers did not order any changes in the way Topeka operates its school system.

"I think it demonstrates that the school district has made great progress and will continue to make great progress, and that regardless of which schools they attend in Topeka they will receive a good education," said Sebelius, son of the late U.S. Rep. Keith Sebelius.

Dan Biles, an Overland Park attorney who represents the state Board of Education, said he was "delighted" and said the ruling "demonstrates that Topeka has an excellent school system that is offering a quality education to all its students."

Chris Hansen, an attorney with the American Civil Liberties Union in New York who handled the case for the plaintiffs, said he found Rogers' conclusion "inexplicable, incredible and inconsistent with prevailing law."

Protesters gather to challenge compact

By DERON JOHNSON
Editorial Page Editor

WATERVILLE — Nearly all of the 300 people gathered in a high school auditorium here Thursday night support Kansas' withdrawal from the five-state low-level nuclear waste compact.

Carrying signs proclaiming such messages as "Water Knows No Boundaries," "We Believe, You Deceive" and "Don't Let Federal Deadlines Compromise Our Safety," citizens listened as officials explained various elements of Kansas' involvement in the compact.

The goal of the meeting was education and formation of a united front against the state's participation in the compact.

"We need to keep this momentum going," said David J. Romano, of the Department of Health and Environment. "That's the reason for this meeting."

Steve Boyda, a Marysville attorney who supports the state's withdrawal from the compact, said the flawed study presented by Dames and Moore, a New York engineering firm which conducted the first two of three reports for the compact, and other errant information justifies the state's exit. Furthermore, Boyda said, residents' fears should not be written off as irrational concerns about the disposal of contaminated hospital gowns.

"I want to know, how dangerous is the low-level stuff?" he said. "The highest (radiation level) of the low-level waste would be dangerous from 300 to 350 years. We're not jumping up and down over gowns and gloves."

Boyda also said that once a waste site is chosen, there are no stipulations stating that the low-level site may not be increased to a high-level

Tighter drug control spurs home manufacturing of speed

By JUDY LUNDSTROM
Staff Writer

Tighter drug control at the nation's borders is helping a new form of an old drug gain popularity on the streets.

Crank, the time-honored nickname for speed, is increasing in popularity, said Detective Darrell Haynes of the Wichita Police Department's Vice and Organized Crime section.

Crank is a methamphetamine that tends to increase alertness and physical activity, Haynes said. Because of the ease of obtaining the chemicals, crank is often manufactured in homes.

Haynes said the procedures for making crank are fairly simple.

"Methamphetamine is fairly easy to produce from a chemical standpoint," he said. "But there's a good chance people could get themselves blown up trying to make it."

Haynes said crank may have gotten its name from heroin, which is also nicknamed crank, because both drugs can be injected.

"The term is 'crank it up' or 'shoot it up,'" he said.

Haynes said crank can be injected, snorted, taken in capsule form or smoked.

"Any way to get it into their system, people will do it," he said.

While crank may be gaining popularity, Haynes said, cocaine is still the most popular hard drug. Crank is cheaper than cocaine, but Haynes said he did not know the street value.

Another difference between cocaine and crank is the penalty for possession and manufacturing of the drugs.

Possession of crank is a misdemeanor, while possession of cocaine is a felony, he said. Manufacturing either drug is a felony.

Selling crank can be more profitable than selling cocaine because importation costs are eliminated, he said.

"Most of it is not imported — it's made in the U.S.A.," he said.

Though not as easily accessible as cocaine, Haynes said, crank is still readily available in Kansas.

"The Midwest has its fair share," he said. "There's plenty of it up in Manhattan."

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said he did not think crank was a severe problem at K-State.

"It's around, but I don't suspect it's a major problem," he said.

Arck said crank is probably less damaging to the body than cocaine, given a standard street dosage.

"There appear to be no severe withdrawal symptoms, but for every high, there's a corresponding low," he said. "One thing it does is really eat you up — it's hard on the stomach."

Arck said he has heard that crank is most popular during finals week.

One user agreed.

"It's especially bad in a college town because it can be used to stay up for exams," said the user, who did not want to be identified.

Cocaine is more popular than crank in Manhattan, he said, but crank is gaining popularity.

"It's fairly easy to get," he said. "About as easy as coke."

The average selling price of crank is about $80 a gram, while cocaine sells for $100 a gram, he said.

The most common method of taking the drug in the Manhattan area is snorting, he said, although some people do inject it.

He said crank is fairly easy to make, but a person "must be set up for it."

"The fact that the government is cracking down on coke is making it more and more popular," he said.

Soviet Union claims espionage

MOSCOW — The Soviet Union put on display Thursday microphones and other gadgets it said were dug from the walls and floors of its U.S. missions and claimed the devices prove that Soviets are victims of American spies.

The devices, some crammed with miniature electronics and no bigger than a pencil, are "material evidence of who is really intruding into the sovereign territory of others," Foreign Ministry spokesman Boris Pyadyshev said at a news briefing.

The briefing and the display of objects allegedly planted at Soviet missions and residences in Washington, San Francisco and New York was a clear Kremlin response to reports that the KGB laced the U.S. Embassy in Moscow with bugging devices and compromised its security.

The Soviet counterattack came as American officials were trying to gauge a sex-and-spy scandal that allegedly involved U.S. Marine guards who became sexually involved with Soviet women and were enticed into allowing KGB agents inside the American Embassy.

Arms issue 'dead,' director says

WASHINGTON — President Reagan's proposal at the Iceland summit to scrap all U.S. and Soviet ballistic missiles over 10 years is a dead issue, nuclear arms control director Kenneth L. Adelman said Thursday.

"The Soviets have rejected it out of hand," Adelman said.

He told reporters the U.S. proposal is still on the negotiating table in Geneva. But, he added, "I don't think it's going to come on the radar screen on arms control again, if you ask me."

Reagan proposed a two-stage plan to Soviet leader Mikhail Gorbachev in Reykjavik, Iceland. In the first five years, the two sides would cut by about one-half their long-range bombers, missiles and submarines. In the next five years, all ballistic missiles would be phased out.

Snowbound couple missing again

IOLA — A couple trapped in a snowbound car for 13 days were reported missing again Thursday after they failed to arrive at a relative's home following their release from a northwest Kansas hospital.

The Kansas Highway Patrol issued an all points bulletin for Nellie Obendorf, 65, and her husband Orville, 71, of Nampa, Idaho.

The Obendorfs left Norton about 10:15 a.m. Wednesday for Iola, about 300 miles away in southeast Kansas, according to Bill Arehart, a dispatcher in the patrol's Norton office.

A state trooper helped them later Wednesday at 2:25 p.m. when their car ran out of gas on Interstate 70 six miles east of Colby, Arehart said. The trooper gave them some fuel and told them they were headed in the wrong direction and needed to turn around.

They haven't been seen or heard from since then, the trooper said.

"I figure they may have stayed at a hotel overnight. But I haven't heard a word from them, and I'm concerned," Georgia Roberts, Mrs. Obendorf's sister, said Thursday night.

Laser game ends in one fatality

RANCHO CUCAMONGA, Calif. — An anguished deputy sheriff was taken off duty and counseled Thursday after fatally shooting a teenager who was using a toy laser gun in mock combat with friends in a dark schoolyard.

The unidentified six-year veteran of the San Bernardino County Sheriff's Department had been called to Central Elementary School at 10 p.m. Tuesday after a passer-by walking a dog reported armed prowlers, sheriff's spokesman Jim Bryant said Thursday.

Leonard Joseph Falcon, 19, who had been playing Lazer Tag with three friends, was shot to death after he fired flashes of light from the toy gun at deputies, Bryant said. He died of two 12-gauge shotgun wounds, coroner's investigators said.

"This kid was in all likelihood thinking he was in the game and that this officer coming around the corner was one of his opponents," Bryant said.

He said Falcon's eyesight may have been hampered by the dark.

"I agonize for that family," said Bryant, "but I also agonize for the deputy involved because I know he's a compassionate human being, a good citizen."

He said witnesses reported seeing the deputy sitting on a curb weeping after the shooting.

The dead youth was also "a good, solid citizen," a Chaffey Community College student who was studying electronics and worked at a fast-food restaurant, Bryant said.

One participant in the game, Ronald Gross, 20, said Falcon, "one of my best friends," had bought the Lazer Tag set only last weekend.

Airlines violate department codes

WASHINGTON — The Transportation Department on Thursday accused two airlines of deceptive scheduling at the Atlanta airport, and said it was expanding its probe into airline scheduling practices at three other busy airports.

The department, which began its investigation of scheduling at Atlanta's Hartsfield International Airport several months ago because of airline delays, said it has tentatively found Delta Air Lines and Eastern Airlines to be engaging in "unrealistic" scheduling that is "deceptive and unfair" to air travelers.

The department gave the airlines until May 11 to respond to the preliminary findings. If flight scheduling by the two airlines is not changed, enforcement actions could amount to as much as a $1,000 fine for each violation, the department said.

Eastern spokesman James Ashlock said, "we categorically deny any inference that there's anything unfair or deceptive about our scheduling." Last month, Eastern president Phil Bakes defended airline scheduling that concentrates flights in peak travel periods, saying the flights are scheduled to meet consumer demand.

Delta officials said the airline was preparing a statement in response to the Transportation Department action.

"Our investigation of scheduling practices at Atlanta has uncovered significant discrepancies between airline schedules that are advertised to the public and the actual on-time performance for those flights," Transportation Secretary Elizbeth Dole said in a statement.

Alumni, bank to offer new credit card

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Graduating seniors inundated with credit card applications may want to hold out for a KSU Wildcat card.

The KSU Alumni Association, in conjunction with First Bank Card Center in Wichita, will be offering Wildcat MasterCard and VISA applications to alumni. The cards are purple, inscribed with Willie the Wildcat on the front and paw prints on the back, said Larry Weigel, executive director of the Alumni Association.

In deciding whether to choose this or another credit card offer, seniors may want to consider the annual percentage rate. Like most banks offering credit cards, First Bank Card Center will charge no interest if the amount owed is paid within 25 days.

However, the annual percentage rate on the Wildcat card after the grace period is lower than many banks offer, said Laura Connor, assistant vice president of First Bank Card Center.

The APR will be 16.8 percent for fee-paying Alumni Association members and 17.88 percent for non-fee paying alumni, she said. A recent Nielsen report showed the average national percentage rate to be 18.83 percent, she said.

Alumni Association membership fees are $20 a year for a single member and $30 a year for joint membership, Weigel said.

Wildcat cards will cost $15 a year for Alumni Association members and $18 a year for non-members, Connor said. To entice non-members to join the association, a mailer offering application for free Wildcat cards for the first year to current and new members will be sent at the end of the month, Weigel said.

Graduating seniors will receive the same offer and will be entitled the association membership fee for half the price in a promotion mailed next fall or they can take advantage of the offer now by joining the Alumni Association in Hollis House, Weigel said.

Weigel said the association is offering the special as a way of luring May graduates to join so the association can keep in touch with them.

"Ideally we want to get them involved in the Alumni Association," Weigel said.

Other Wildcat card benefits include $150,000 travel/accident insurance on passenger travel tickets purchased with the card; $400 optional cash advance for Alumni Association members; and for people who want to switch from another credit card service, free transfer and a 25-day grace period on the current balance, Connor said.

The Alumni Association will prosper by receiving 0.2 percent of the net sales volume from Wildcat card purchases. In addition, it will be given $5 for non-members and $3 for members from the yearly service charge, Connor said.

Weigel said income from the cards should amount to "well over $100,000 dollars over the next three years" and will be used for student recruitment, updating the K-STATER, the University's alumni publication, and other projects.

Five other Kansas colleges and universities are offering the credit cards bearing each school's mascot, including the University of Kansas, The Wichita State University, Emporia State University, and Friends University and Kansas Newman in Wichita, Connor said.

Alzheimer's Helpline available to families

By JONI MANLEY
Collegian Reporter

Alzheimer's disease, an ailment affecting the brain, is widespread among Kansans, afflicting an estimated 29,000 residents.

"Alzheimer's disease occurs in nerve cells in the brain that control the memory, thinking and judgment," said Brenda Stapp, coordinator for the Alzheimer's Disease Helpline.

Former Gov. John Carlin formed an Alzheimer's disease task force in April 1985. The task force started the toll-free hot line available to anyone in need of assistance or with a family member affected by the disease.

Stapp said the hot line was set up to assist families who need information about the progression of the disease, its cause, how to care for a victim and manage behaviors, legal and financial care, resources available and where to get help.

The hot line is funded by the Kansas Department on Aging, Stapp said.

Alzheimer's is known to afflict more than 1.5 million people in the United States.

"The disease usually strikes people in their 40s and 50s, but the youngest case reported is 28 years old," Stapp said.

A person with Alzheimer's disease will have many symptoms, including a gradual decline in memory; disorientation in both time and space; difficulties in word finding and communication; and changes in personality.

"This disease has a lengthy process, may extend over several years and is known to have a devastating impact on the family," Stapp said.

A cure for the disease is not yet available, but treatment consists largely of helping the patient and the family cope with the illness, she said.

Medication can be given to help control behavior symptoms like paranoia and agitation when they occur, Stapp said.

The hot line also is open to any other Alzheimer's disease-related disorders, Stapp said. These include Parkinson's disease, Huntington's disease, Pick's disease and others.

After people have called the hot line, staff members can refer callers to other resources for help. Most of the resources available are in cities, but information is available from some rural community services, Stapp said.

Stapp said the hot line should have more people calling, but since Alzheimer's disease changes so often and is affecting more people each year, a lot of people do not realize the hot line is available to them.

Student takes Bradley's place for day

By The Collegian Staff

It was a day off for Student Body President Kent Bradley and an eye-opener of a day for Joe Geisinger.

Geisinger, sophomore in mechanical engineering, was named student body president for the day Thursday, in a random drawing from 300-400 entries.

"I didn't realize how much (Bradley) has to do," Geisinger said. "It's really a learning experience. A lot of people say that the title of student body president is just a title...There is so much more involved and so much time commitment involved in being president."

Bradley, junior in nutritional science, felt that the Student Body President For a Day program should be expanded from once a year to once a semester.

"When I first came in here it took me some time to adjust," Bradley said. "If a person is seriously interested in student government, it would show what they should plan on doing when they get involved with it."

Bradley and Geisinger both felt that the president for a day would be a great public relations tool for the president's office.

"Most people don't realize that he has to travel to Topeka about two or three times a month," Geisinger said. "Before today, when I read about the student government activities in the paper it seemed like there wasn't that much time involved with Student Senate. Going around with Kent all day makes one realize just how much time is involved.

"With this kind of event, it lets me talk candidly about what I do," Bradley said. "It also gives the person, who is serving for the day, a chance to see student government at work on an average day."

Was this the kind of experience that might prompt Geisinger to run for student body president someday?

"Not really," Geisinger said. "I'd like to, but I'm in engineering, and that is a time-consuming major in its own right. I wouldn't mind giving it a shot someday if I had the time.

"I admire Kent in how he is able to balance school, his campaigning for the school in Topeka and around the state, and time in the office."

Seniors should donate $20 to K-State's future

With the financial crunch setting in for everybody, including college students, the prospect for funding looks bleak. The numerous problems the University has due to inadequate amounts of money is the topic of many gripe sessions held between students.

However, graduating seniors are being given the chance to help next year's college students by the Kansas State University Student Foundation. Seniors are being called and asked to contribute $20 a year for the next three years to a Pacesetter scholarship fund at the University.

First thoughts may be negative. The last thing most seniors want to do is fork over more money to this University, but think about it...it's only $20 dollars a year and the first payment isn't due until a year after you graduate.

If all graduating seniors give $20 for the first three years after they are out, added to the $20 of the all the graduated seniors in the two classes before them, it adds up to a lot of money each year that could really help improve and further other students' educations.

This program isn't asking you to give until it hurts.

The first Pacesetter scholarship of $500 will be given next academic year. The student will receive $250 for the fall semester and an equal payment for the spring semester. The requirements for the Pacesetter scholarship are that the student be enrolled full time at K-State, be involved on campus and have a grade point average of 3.2 or above.

Scholarship searches just another headache

When will it end?

In a troubling era of diminishing financial aid awards and depleted pools of loan money, there is another worry for students hoping to somehow locate the resources to receive a college education. A service which seemed to be the proverbial light at the end of a very dim education tunnel is really no more than just another dead-end scam.

Companies promising at least five sources of computer-matched student aid are flourishing under the premise that there are hundreds of millions of unclaimed financial aid dollars that no one has bothered to claim. How convenient.

Unfortunately, not only is the claim of unused money suspect, but there are very few students who ever receive anything from these services other than a $50 debit to the checking account. The services guarantee sources of aid, but none guarantee a student will actually receive aid.

Although companies of this type exist everywhere, it is disturbing to see them preying on students who turn to them as a last resort. Some companies claim that they are merely an information source and that is good enough.

Somehow, that limitation isn't illustrated in their advertising. But if it were, these companies wouldn't be in business and students wouldn't be needlessly giving money in an attempt to locate other much-needed money.

It's all part of a game and, as usual, students end up the losers. Go straight to financial jail. Don't pass "Go."

The best thing that can be done to put bogus companies out of business is for students to be wise consumers. Students should realize in advance that very few will provide realistic, unique sources of financial aid. According to at least one major study, none will actually produce a financial aid award.

With a little common sense, students need not always be deprived of passing "Go."

Don't depend on drugs to get past finals week

Because of stricter government control on the importing of drugs into the country, an old drug is gaining popularity in the area.

Crank, not to be confused with the cocaine derivative crack, is a nickname for street speed. A form of methamphetamine, it is not difficult to manufacture, police say.

Nor is it difficult to obtain. Selling for about $20 a gram less than cocaine, crank is steadily becoming a cocaine substitute. The effects of the drug are similar to that of "crystal," a highly charged methamphetamine that produces a wave of physical and psychological exhilaration upon injection or absorption. The dangers of the drug are similar as well. Physically, the dangers are pretty straightforward — the body nearly literally burns itself up. Vitamin and mineral deficiencies can result because the user often goes days or weeks at a time without rest and usually without food.

But the drug doesn't stop with physical complications. Its use can produce full-blown psychotic states as well as insomnia, anxiety, depression and fatigue.

We've heard this all before, you say. What's the big deal? The big deal is that finals are just around the corner. And, like always, the pressures are intense and the time for studying minimal. The thought of a "rush" can be tempting. Faster is better, some say.

Maybe so. But not when it comes to a lifetime.

Graduation begins new world

Editor's note: This is the final part of a column which began last week.

JEAN TELLER
Collegian Columnist

May 17 arrives. Graduation is over with. The parents have presented you with whatever they feel is appropriate for a bona fide college graduate. The little brother is suitably impressed and the little sister is hoping to follow in your footsteps. The aunts and uncles and grandparents are thrilled that you finally finished. And everyone expects you to make good, to be somebody.

You find a place to live in the city where your new job is located. For most of you, it will be a fair distance from here and your hometown. And it will probably be a city where you've never lived before and you don't know a soul.

That's the first clue of what you are up against. Loneliness. It's the biggest problem you will face your first year out. It's also the one problem you may never overcome and the problem which will make or break you as an individual.

You'll have to learn to be by yourself. You'll have to learn you can rely on only yourself. No one else will be there at 3 a.m. when the blues hit. You have to be your own best friend. If you don't like yourself now, or if you can't stand to be by yourself, learn. You'll need the skill, believe me.

Some advice to fight the loneliness. If you can handle it, become more outgoing, if you're not already. Learn to meet people, to talk to people you've never met. You should find people at your new job who have the same interests and who will provide a network of support. If you're lucky.

My first job had such weird hours no one else at the television station was at work or off work at the same time I was. And I never saw the people who lived in my apartment building. They all had normal hours.

It will take time, probably the whole first year, but you will eventually meet people and regain a semblance of a social life. Just don't expect it the first week. The real world doesn't work that way. There are no built-in social groups and contacts. You won't be able to walk down the hall or call a friend on impulse. You have to make your own social life, your own contacts. A friend recently told me she is now the most comfortable she has been since she left school, and she's been in her current job for five years.

You have a new apartment, a new job and a paycheck. Now what? If you have the right job, you work from 8 to 5 and have all that time to do whatever you want. But what do you want to do?

The network of friends isn't there to call upon. You don't have to worry about studying anymore. There's television, but that only goes so far when you're by yourself. That's when the lonelies hit. So develop other outlets.

Join groups. Go to the movies. Work overtime? (Maybe!) Learn to read for enjoyment again. Join a health club. You'll have lots of time to yourself, so learn to use it again. You have only the one job to worry about, the one boss to satisfy, the one place you HAVE to be at a certain time. Learn to enjoy the extra time but develop contacts and avocations away from the workplace. You'll be happier that way.

Which brings us to another difference of the "real" world. You will have to learn to be by yourself but you will also have to learn to be somewhere at a certain time every single day. You can't blow off work like you did classes. Classes and instructors don't require an explanation (at least not most of the time). Work and bosses do. And they won't take just any old excuse.

It's time to learn responsibility and discipline. Even if you don't feel like going to work — you'd rather be playing softball or sunning at the lake — you have to do it.

This is one thing you may have already learned. I hope so. Because it's a shock if you don't know how to maintain the discipline it takes to keep at one task for a long period of time. It gets boring after awhile. One job and the same faces day in and day out can become really monotonous after a period of time.

That's another thing about the "real" world. It can get boring. It can be the same all the time. It can be dreaded or it can be contained and made to work for you.

Many of you have dreams you hope to fulfill within the next five or 10 years. You have an idea of where you'll be, who you'll be. It helps to have a dream, to have goals. But don't be inflexible. Learn to go with it, to change those dreams, to be yourself, to make the system work for you.

If you don't learn that, if you can't make the system work for you, if you can't adapt, you'll break down. You will never become the person in your dreams. If you let the boredom or the loneliness or the responsibilities get to you, the world wins and you lose. You become the person you wanted to avoid.

It's not hard to do. Everyone loses something when you head for the "real" world. You lose a part of yourself you thought you'd never lose. But you gain something, too. You change and mature and learn to live in a world as big as anything you ever imagined.

College isn't the real world. It's a slice of something you will never experience again. College is isolation, it's safe and it's different. College life does not really prepare you for what's outside.

It may prepare you to do a job. But college cannot prepare you for real life and never will. You have to experience that for yourself. You have to live in the real world to know what the real world actually is.

You and only you can experience the first year out of college. No one else can teach you the way it really is. No one can experience the "real" world for you. I hope you experience it to its fullest. I hope you learn to cope and I hope you learn that despite the problems, the "real" world is the only place to be.

Letters

Offensive cartoon

Editor,

This letter is in response to the editorial cartoon of March 30. I think the cartoon communicates a common but erroneous concept.

If you're tempted to throw all of Christianity out the window based on reports of questionable acts of some highly visible Christians, consider this first: The Christian religion is based on the actions and words of God, not the actions and words of people.

God is the one who claims and demonstrates perfection. He said that all men (this means you!) have failed to follow the laws He set down when He created everything, and therefore all men will be required to pay the penalty of their disobedience. This penalty is eternal separation from God; it is known as hell.

Because God loves us each individually and wants each of us to be with Him for eternity, He has provided a solution to this problem. The solution was to send His son, Jesus, to die on the cross in your and my place. Remember that each one of us is guilty before God and owes Him a life as payment for our disobedience. Jesus lived a perfect life and willingly died to pay the penalty for each person. All that remains for us to do is accept that gift.

This is a summary of what I believe is the central message of the Bible and the actions of God that form the foundation of the Christian faith. Before deciding that we don't want religious values, we should make sure we are judging the true values promoted by the religion as set forth by God, not just some values or actions that were expressed by a fallible human being.

Athletics defended

Editor,

Enough is enough. The athletic department has taken enough abuse in the letters to the editor and it's about time another side of the story is heard.

I'm a part of the K-State track team, so I particularly took offense to the letter written earlier concerning the student fee. The letter was directed toward head track coach John Capriotti and his inability to accept the defeat of the student fee. What is wrong with his wanting K-State to have a program all can be proud of? I guess we have a coach who cares too much. We have accepted the defeat of the student fee, but now students have found something else to complain about.

In the March 30 issue, one writer asked if the purpose of K-State was to give students an education or to provide a home for aspiring pro athletes. If you ask the majority of K-State athletes, they will tell you the same answer — they are here for an education.

Why is it people must complain about athletes enrolling early? Isn't it a rather childish and selfish reaction to say, "If I can't do something then it should be the same for everybody else?" That is basically the reaction I get from Dave Miles' letter. Quit assuming all athletes are "dumb jocks" (we have track athletes with 4.0 grade point averages to disprove that theory) and realize that we are here for an education also.

Being a student athlete requires hard work and plenty of time; early enrollment is one minor step to give us some help. Regardless of how enrollment is done, there will be somebody upset about it. So those who are upset now must learn the word "acceptance." It's a word the K-State athletic department has become very familiar with and learned to adjust to. I suggest everybody else do the same.

Training sessions explain aid forms

By DERON JOHNSON
Editorial Page Editor

Remember in grade school when before every test your teacher would implore you to read — really read — the instructions? You would sigh, skim the directions and dive in. And then when you got the test back the next day, there inevitably would be a stupid — really stupid — error because you didn't read the directions.

According to Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, in some aspects the college students of today haven't changed all that much from the grammar school students of yesterday. When completing financial aid forms, students still are not reading the directions.

"Most of the errors on forms result from students not carefully reading the instructions," Viterna said. "Mostly, students need to be sure they read the directions and not just guess at what they should be doing."

However, if reading and rereading financial aid forms does not make their intent clear, the financial assistance office offers training sessions to explain the forms' questions to students and parents.

"(For) students (who) go through training sessions on the forms, in most cases it's the parents who fill out the forms," said Christine Crenshaw, associate director of student financial assistance.

"They ought to go to training sessions and learn how to fill it out in the most helpful way possible," Crenshaw said.

Sometimes, a student is ineligible for aid because the form was filled out carelessly or simply because the student was uninformed about the best ways to secure aid. A training session would minimize those errors, she said.

She also urges students to apply early. Laws, which Crenshaw said often change "overnight," and funds that are distributed early should encourage students to apply as early as possible.

While the Office of Student Financial Assistance has no way of knowing the specific errors committed on forms, Crenshaw said, the lack of a signature is often a careless mistake.

"The ones we know about are the ones where the students don't sign their name," she said. Because there is no signature, the forms are returned to the aid office.

If a feeling of total confusion sets in, Viterna and Crenshaw recommend the student contact the financial aid office.

Failure to do so, or blindly guessing, could cost the student much — including money. Although the office is willing to help, Crenshaw said, it won't fill out the form on behalf of the student.

Crenshaw said the most confusing elements of the form include evaluating assets and how to give a correct valuation to a home or business. Also, she said some parents are confused if there is someone living in home who is not their own child because there is a question regarding the declaration of that person as a dependent.

Terms may be key obstacle

Editor's Note: This is the final part of a five-part series on student financial aid. Today's presentation includes explanations frequently encountered in aid applications.

THE GIVE & TAKE OF FINANCIAL AID

Often, the principle obstacle of understanding the financial aid application process is wading through the specific and foreign terminology. Indeed, "financial aid-ese" can be complicated and frustrating.

Following is a list of common terms or phrases associated with financial aid and their meanings. The listings were obtained from Larry Viterna, director of student financial assistance, and information supplied by the Office of Student Financial Assistance.

Need. The amount of money needed to supplement available money in order to fund an education. The figure is obtained by subtracting a student's available money from his or her expected expenses.

Student Expense Budget. The expected costs a student will face while attending a specific institution. It considers tuition and fees, books, supplies, food, housing, transportation, clothing and personal or medical care.

Base Year. The period of time on which the need (for financial assistance) determination is based. For dependent students, the time is the year previous to when he or she is applying for financial aid. For example, a student applying for aid for the 1987-88 year will use 1986 as the base year.

For independent students, estimated future income for the academic year is used. An independent student applying for aid for 1987-88 will use the period July 1, 1987, to June 30, 1988, as the base year.

Independent Student. To be considered independent, a student must meet one of the four following criteria:

—One, the student is 24 or older by Dec. 31 of the award year.

—Two, the student is an orphan, ward of the court, a veteran of the armed forces or has legal dependents other than a spouse.

—Three, the student is a graduate, professional student or married student who will not be claimed as a dependent for income tax purposes by a parent or guardian for the first calendar year of the award year.

—Four, the student is a single undergraduate with no dependents and has not been claimed as a dependent for income tax purposes by a parent or guardian for the two calendar years preceeding the award year. The student must prove self-sufficiency by earning at least $4,000 during those two years. Financial aid may not be counted as part of the $4,000.

Satisfactory Academic Progress. This term is used to gauge the success of a student receiving assistance. An undergraduate must enroll in and pass at least 12 hours, and a graduate student must enroll in and pass nine hours per semester. Passing is considered a grade of "D" or above, and an undergraduate must have compiled at least a 2.0 grade point average upon completion of 60 credit hours.

Work/Study Overaward. When a student earns more money than is allowed, as determined by his or her need analysis. For example, if a student is slated to earn $500 maximum in a work/study program and the student earns $750, there is a $250 "overaward," upon which the Office of Student Financial Assistance may demand repayment, especially if federal dollars are involved. Or, other aid the student is receiving may be reduced to compensate for the overaward. Campus jobs not considered work/study and are not considered into the overaward figure.

Disenrollment. This is a situation which will deny aid to a student, even if previously approved, because a part of the enrollment process was not completed. For instance, a transfer student who has enrolled and paid fees, but never had a transcript forwarded, is considered "disenrolled" and therefore ineligible for aid.

Financial Aid Warning. A probationary period when a student has not fulfilled a requirement of the aid package. For instance, if a student completes nine of the required 12 hours, the student is placed on financial aid warning. The student must successfully complete 15 hours the next semester — the required 12 plus the three not completed the previous semester — to have the warning designation removed.

Financial Aid Exclusion. When a student receives this designation, he or she is no longer eligible for financial aid because of unfulfilled academic obligations. There is an appeal process whereby the student may become eligible for aid again. To appeal an exclusion designation, the student must fill out a form which asks for identification of unusual circumstances concerning why the student could not meet the agreement.

National university rankings soon to change, lecturer says

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY
Collegian Reporter

The effects of quality teaching, future research and new technology could create a shift in the ranking of U.S. universities, said Marie L. Brennan, director of the Department of Food and Nutrition Services at the hospital of the University of Pennsylvania in Philadelphia.

Brennan spoke Thursday in the Union Big Eight Room to about 125 students, faculty and alumni. "The Challenge of Change in Education and Practice" was Brennan's topic for the 13th Annual Grace Shugart Lecture.

Brennan discussed some changes that are likely to take place in the academic environment.

"For the first time in 30 years there will be a genuine likelihood that the rankings of the nation's principle universities will shift," Brennan said.

"The cost of competing for faculty, the uncertainty of the direction of future research, the challenges and extent of integrating new technology into well-established research and institutional programming will reduce the number of institutions of truly national and international standards," she said.

Competition among universities could also contribute to the shift, Brennan said.

"The 1990s will witness intensifying competition for students, for research funding and particularly for the limited supply of scholars and teachers."

Many of the top students at colleges are being offered attractive jobs and salaries, keeping some students from staying in school and possibly becoming instructors. For this reason, quality instructors will be in high demand in the near future, she said.

"In order to excel, educational institutions must recruit and promote young faculty of great promise, reward and retain faculty and attract established faculty which can provide important leadership in both research and instructional programming," she said.

In the future, universities will most likely have to develop ways of attracting established professors from one school to another, Brennan said.

In addition to changes in education and practice, Brennan discussed changes in dietetic programs.

"This September, all dietetic education programs will begin to move into a common body of knowledge, skills and values," she said. "All entry-level dietitians coming into the marketplace will be expected to meet knowledge and performance requirements in clinical dietetics dealing with nutrition and service systems management."

This action represents several years of careful study by education experts and analysts. It is believed the new standards of education will allow flexibility and creativity in program development, Brennan said.

The dietitian entering the profession must have creativity, flexibility, a thirst for knowledge and most importantly the ability to care about people, Brennan said.

"The challenge is to develop quality time with individual patients," she said.

Brennan, a registered dietitian and an authority on food service management, has had extensive experience in the dietetics field. She is a member of the American Dietetic Association, editor of "Dietetic Practice Group Newsletter" and is on the advisory board for the food emergency committee for the American Red Cross of Philadelphia.

Bowles

country's problem of poverty and scarcity because people would work harder to benefit from their own work.

Smith also thought capitalism would destroy despotism (rule of absolute power) because there would be no need for superpowers.

"The problem with this philosophy is that factories came into existence, and people started working under the authority of a boss," Bowles said. "This was no less severe than the nobility's authority of the serf."

A problem with capitalism also surfaced in the 1960s, Bowles said. A solution for the poor economy was to give the working man more money to spend.

"They thought that money in the hands of the average person will make the economy profitable," Bowles said.

This didn't work, however, because capitalism operates on an economy based on insecurity, and people were becoming secure in their positions, Bowles said.

"If everyone has a job, they don't have to listen to what their boss says and they start making demands," he said.

In capitalism, it is important to keep people deliberately unemployed to maintain the loyalty and gratitude of those who have jobs, Bowles said.

site. Nor are there stipulations, he said, prohibiting the expansion of the site itself or the extension beyond 30 years of the time waste can be deposited.

Becky Dunlap, a licensed practical nurse from Marshall County who is leading a grass-roots effort against the compact, said the group has gathered 2,000 signatures for a petition, which she presented at the forum to Sen. Don Montgomery, R-Sabetha, which includes Marshall County.

"We've been called radicals, chicken littles and armchair nuclear experts, but what we are is concerned citizens," said Dunlap. "By withdrawing now, we can cut our losses. The sooner we withdraw, the less we are going to suffer later."

Montgomery said the legislature's apparent lack of concern before now is because of a delay in receiving the Dames and Moore report, which he also condemned as inaccurate.

"I think if we had had the information earlier about the Dames and Moore report, the Legislature would have been much more concerned earlier," he said.

Montgomery said Gov. Mike Hayden is establishing a task force to review the compact's actions. Members of most state agencies as well as a representative of K-State will serve on the task force.

Track teams shun Dallas for Norman

By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

Opting to bypass the Southern Methodist Invitational in Dallas this weekend, K-State's track team will travel to Norman, Okla., Saturday for the John Jacobs Invitational.

"We didn't feel like driving the nine hours it takes to get to SMU because we just got back from a big meet at College Station," Capriotti said.

"Besides, the quality of meet down there in Oklahoma is a lot better than I thought it was going to be and the drive is only about five hours and that cuts down a lot of time that they'll miss from classes...I don't want them missing too many classes."

Other Big Eight Conference teams participating in the 15-team field are Oklahoma, Nebraska, Kansas and Oklahoma State. The field will also be composed of several junior college teams.

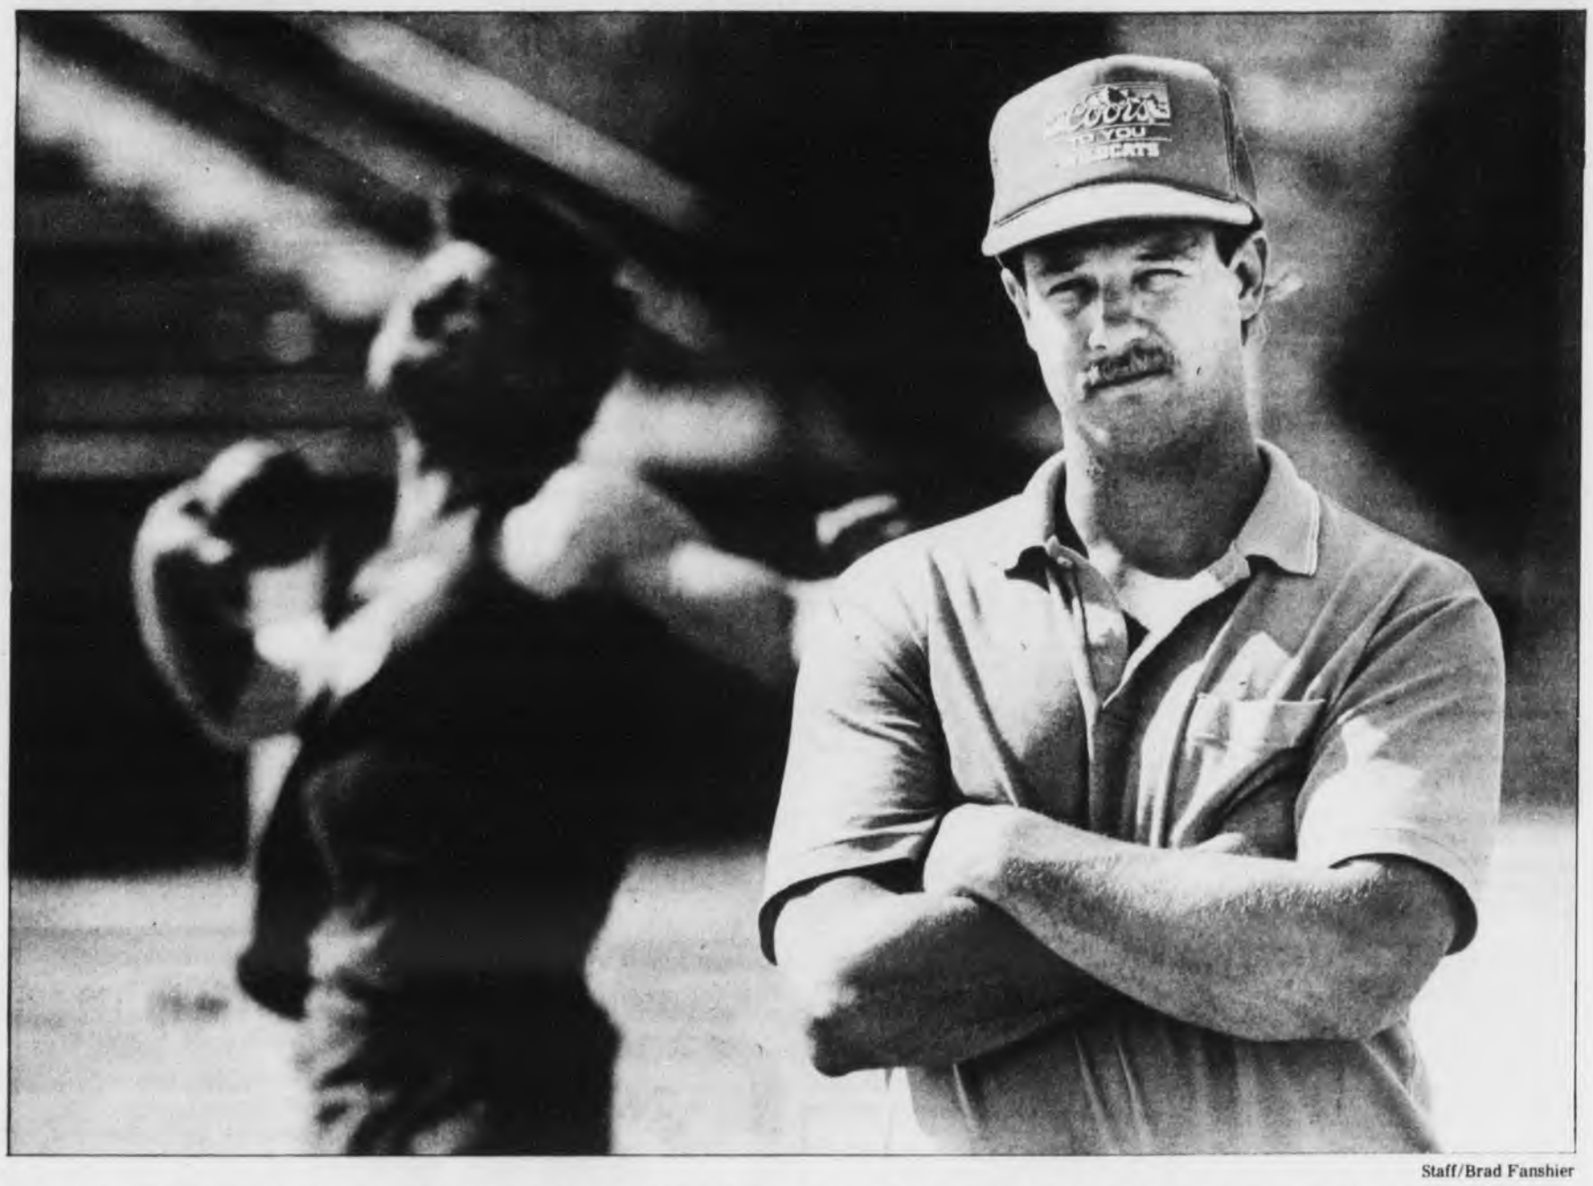
Many of K-State's athletes participating in this weekend's competition will be in preparation for some tough competition coming up within the next few weeks.

"Kenny Harrison will be in both the long jump and triple jump and most of the distance runners will train through," Capriotti said.

Looking ahead to future competition, he said this year's team is looking strong in most areas of competition. The chance of a Big Eight championship is definitely not counted out this year, but will be difficult to attain with a track powerhouse like Nebraska in the conference, Capriotti said.

"We're optimistic at this point," Capriotti said. "We're getting people healthy, people are starting to do well."

Minister doubles as 'Cat track coach



By DAVE WAGNER
Sports Writer

When searching for a happy medium in life, it is inevitable that cherished possessions and lifelong pursuits will have to be put aside in order to become established in another area.

It isn't often that one can integrate two of one's highest priorities and make a living at the same time.

Ray Hansen, K-State assistant track coach and youth minister at the First Assembly Church of God, has searched for this balance, and found it.

"The only two things in life that I could ever see myself doing are ministering and coaching. Here, I can do both at the same time," Hansen said.

Staff/Brad Fanshier

Ray Hansen, K-State assistant track coach in charge of the weight and throwing events, enjoys working at K-State and has no plans to leave Manhattan. Hansen, a former Big Eight conference champion in the javelin, is training for the 1988 Olympic trials in the event.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

Hailing from Monroe, La., Hansen came to K-State in 1982 to throw the javelin and wasted no time establishing himself as a forced to be reckoned with in the Big Eight Conference. Among his credentials while competing for the Wildcats are two conference championships in the javelin, a school record toss of 283-feet-0 and twice being named All-American in that event.

After graduating in 1984 with a bachelor's degree in psychology, Hansen competed in the '84 Olympic Trials but didn't make the finals. The experience was one that has kept him in competition and his hopes alive of qualifying for the 1988 Olympic trials.

"(Participating in the Olympic Trials was) fantastic, it was a great experience and what it really did was get my foot in the door for this next time," Hansen said. "I still plan on being there next year."

With the desire to coach at the college level, Hansen took a graduate assistant position with the throwing coach on K-State's track team, and worked in that capacity for two years. Last year, head coach John Capriotti offered Hansen the assistant coaching position in charge of the weight and throwing events. Wanting to coach all his life, Hansen accepted and is now in his first year.

Upon taking the position, Hansen said the situation he's in is different than a normal coaching position because three of the athletes he coaches are the same people he worked out with when he competed.

"I was an athlete here with Pinkie Suggs, Doug Brown and Dan Meyers, who are still here," Hansen said.

So Hansen was faced with the transition from being a fellow athlete to becoming known as "Coach" — a change Hansen said wasn't too difficult.

"I think they had to accept me as a coach first and it hasn't been any problem...I think they all have accepted that. My approach to them hasn't changed much because I always 'coached' when I was there throwing the javelin."

With two established careers in Manhattan, Hansen said he can't see himself leaving in the near future. The only option he has considered is joining Athletes in Action based in Los Angeles. The Christian organization has asked Hansen to join their team.

"They do a lot of tours," he said. "This summer they want me to go tour Sweden with them.

"I tell you what, though, I can see myself staying at K-State forever...I really like Manhattan, I like the people, the church and the school," he added.

"Right now, with a lot of things working my way, giving me a chance to grow where I need to go, I'll stay here."

K-State's baseball team still looking for 1st conference win

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

K-State's baseball team will attempt to secure its first Big Eight Conference victories of the season Saturday when it plays its arch rival, the University of Kansas Jayhawks.

The double-header is scheduled to start at noon at Frank Myers Field. The two teams will meet in another twinbill Sunday starting at 12:30 p.m.

The Wildcats, 14-14 overall and 0-5 in conference play, appear to have an edge on the Jayhawks, who had a lackluster record of 8-20-1 before their double-header Thursday against Baker University.

However, K-State Coach Mike Clark doesn't underestimate Kansas.

"They'll (Kansas) be a battling ballclub," Clark said. "The game will be typical of every K-State-KU series — they'll come in very competitive and very hungry for a win."

Clark said the Jayhawks have been experiencing some "tough times" since Coach Marty Pattin, who compiled a 115-151-1 record in five years at Kansas, resigned about two weeks ago.

"They're in a difficult situation having their coach resign," Clark said. "It puts a dent your chemistry when something like this happens. Marty's a super guy."

Last year, the two teams split their four-game series in Lawrence. K-State lost the first two games, but came back to win 11-9 and 12-8.

"(KU's) fielding and pitching has been their downfall," Clark said. "They've got some good arms, but haven't been able to put it all together. They've also had some reliever problems, which has resulted in them losing some games in the late innings."

K-State's pitching cast, meanwhile, is close to returning to top form.

"It looks like we're getting healthy at the right time," Clark said. "We'll have seven pitchers this weekend — that will be nice for a change."

In Saturday's games, Zack Kimbell (2-2) and Darryl Rowley (0-3) will be on the mound for K-State. Rowley has been out of the Wildcats' lineup due to an injury.

"Darryl has really looked sharp," Clark said. "I think the lay-off did him a world of good."

On Sunday, converted fielders Mike Hamacher and Mike Hinkle will pitch for the 'Cats. Hamacher is 3-1 for the season and pitched seven innings Tuesday in K-State's 10-5 win over Fort Hays State University. Hinkle's record is 2-1.

Clark said pitcher Rocky Ferguson, who has been laid-up due to calcium deposits in his elbow, will be available for relief pitching. Third-baseman Jim Donahue should also see action after missing Wednesday's games with an ankle injury.

NOTES: Through K-State's first 28 games, Hinkle and David Chadd are neck-and-neck in leading the team in batting average — Hinkle is batting .398 and Chadd is batting .397...K-State's earned-run average is 7.20, while their opponents' ERA has averaged 7.25...Jeff Turtle leads the Wildcats in runs batted in with 27; Hinkle has 25 RBI...Rusty Ringgenberg and Scott Spangenberg lead K-State in stolen bases with seven each.

Judges select Wildcats' cheering squads

By TODD SCHULTZ
Collegian Reporter

Competition for a spot on the 1987-88 varsity and junior varsity cheerleading teams was intense, to say the least. One man even came from Texas to try out.

Every applicant at Thursday's cheerleader tryout in Ahearn Field House had either drill team or previous cheering experience, making the final decisions tough for the panel of five judges.

"This year the competition is much stiffer. We have about the same number of people, but the quality this year is so much better," said Scott Johnson, cheerleading sponsor. "The depth is unbelievable."

Twenty-three women and 15 men tried out for 14 varsity positions — seven male and seven female — and 10 junior varsity positions.

The competition was so intense that none of the returning varsity and jv cheerleaders were guaranteed a spot, Johnson said. But he said their experience might have given them an added edge.

"They might have been a little more comfortable in front of the judges," he said.

The men were judged on general appearance, jumps and tumbling, the fight song routine and stunts performed with non-returning squad members. Judges placed emphasis on jumps and tumbling.

For the women, the judges considered general appearance, jumps and tumbling, the fight song routine, stunts and a dance routine. Most important were the fight song, double stunts and the dance routine.

The judges interviewed all applicants as a part of the selection process.

"(The applicants) are judged on not just ability, but on potential," said Willie the Wildcat, who was assisting with tryouts.

To help prepare the applicants, this year's cheerleaders taught routines and stunts at three-hour clinics each night this week.

Candidate David Meier, freshman in pre-professional business administration, was a yell leader at Hutchinson Community College and "really loved it."

"It was the biggest blast of my life," he said.

Bill Criqui, freshman in engineering, tried out because his fraternity brothers encouraged him to become involved on campus, and he believed yell leading would be a good way. Criqui was chosen as a varsity cheerleader.

Sherry Cook, sophomore in psychology, has cheered since eighth grade and decided to try out when she transferred to K-State this spring. She was selected to the junior varsity squad.

"Every time I watched the games, I thought I should be out there," Cook said.

Varsity cheerleaders perform at football and men's basketball games. The junior varsity squad cheers at junior varsity football and women's basketball games.

The junior varsity squad wasn't filled to allow freshmen to try out next fall, said Jeannette O' Connell, senior in journalism and mass communications and previous squad member.

This year is only the second year for the junior varsity squad to be guaranteed cheering position. In the past they were substitutes for varsity members.

The five judges were Anne Brull, former sponsor of the cheerleaders and former cheerleader at the University of Kansas; Kenny Mossman, athletic department administrative assistant; J.D. Higgason, former yell leader at K-State; Debi Good, head coach of the Little Apple Gymnastics Club, and Manhattan resident Dorsey Travis, wife of athletic director Larry Travis.

Disabled participate in riding clinic

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Eleven mentally handicapped children and adults walked and trotted horses around Weber Arena Sunday afternoon during the KSU Horseman's Association riding clinic.

The clinic participants started out the afternoon watching club members demonstrate how to brush, saddle and bridle horses. The participants then rode horses led by K-State students around the arena.

A game of "Simon Says" was played on horseback with the riders calling out "whoa," making turns or backing up their horses until they were eliminated from the game one by one.

Angelo-Garzio, professor of art, sheds some light on the art of ceramics and its history while adding bits and pieces of his own philosophies as well. Currently spending most of his working hours in a potter's studio, Garzio says in future days he'll be on his farm near Manhattan where growing trees are his main concern. See Page 4.

By The Collegian Staff

Saturday morning a K-State freshman was found dead in his car after apparently committing suicide.

Stephen Lobmeyer, 18, freshman in pre-medicine from Lakewood, Colo., died in his 1974 Ford Mustang of carbon monoxide poisoning early Saturday morning. Friday, Lobmeyer was arrested by the Riley County Police Department and charged with a DUI before being released on $500 bond.

After being contacted by a pedestrian, Riley County policemen found Lobmeyer in his car in front of apartments at Road. The found a g the exhaus car.

"We believe that to be the event that convinced him to do this," Yoder said. "We did not have any previous reason to suspect that he was a candidate for suicide.

"He didn't express any problems to us; we wish he would have," Yoder said.

Robert Cathey, district coroner, said the exact amount of carbon monoxide in Lobmeyer's body has not yet been determined, but preliminary test results show there was "certainly enough to be lethal."

"There's no doubt that that was the cause of death," Cathey said.

Cathey said the hose was "pinched

Disabled participate in riding clinic

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Eleven mentally handicapped children and adults walked and trotted horses around Weber Arena Sunday afternoon during the KSU Horseman's Association riding clinic.

The clinic participants started out the afternoon watching club members demonstrate how to brush, saddle and bridle horses. The participants then rode horses led by K-State students around the arena.

A game of "Simon Says" was played on horseback with the riders calling out "whoa," making turns or backing up their horses until they were eliminated from the game one by one.

"Legal Eagles"

Robert Redford plays a lightheaded lawyer in last year's most overrated film. Co-star Debra Winger ("Black Widow") is his partner, and together they try to get their client off the hook for a crime she did or did not commit.

Daryl Hannah ("Splash") is the accused and the love interest for Redford. Winger likes him too but tries to play cute by not telling him. That's just the tip of the paperwork.

The characters are aimless; the story is weak, and as far as the plot goes, it has more knots than Whoopi Goldberg's hair. With big names and an even bigger budget, "Legal Eagles" tried very hard to soar but only ended up laying a big fat egg.

"Soul Man"

C. Thomas Howell ("Class") is a white boy playing a black man whose black girlfriend meets his white parents whom she knows nothing about. Well, you get the picture.

It's a comedy about one man's stuggle to get into Harvard Law School and the colorful scheme he cooks up to get there. Rae Dawn Chong ("Color Purple") is his girlfriend and Broadway veteran James Earl Jones is his stern, stiff-lipped professor and adviser.

The film makes outlandish, insightful and sobering statements about racial matters which really are more than just skin deep.

"Ferris Bueller's Day Off"

If you ever wondered what Mike Seever from "Growing Pains" would grow up to be like, check out this flick.

Matthew Broderick ("War Games") is the wisecracking, class-skipping, smooth-talking Ferris Bueller who's at best Eddie Haskell and James Bond combined.

It's the story of a day in the life of a high school teen, his friends, the cars they trash, the trouble they cause and a principal who's on their trail. With textbook references along the way, writer John Hughes provides a step-by-step guide to letting "leisure rule."

Saturday morning a K-State freshman was found dead in his car after apparently committing suicide.

Stephen Lobmeyer, 18, freshman in pre-medicine from Lakewood, Colo., died in his 1974 Ford Mustang of carbon monoxide poisoning early Saturday morning. Friday, Lobmeyer was arrested by the Riley County Police Department and charged with a DUI before being released on $500 bond.

After being contacted by a pedestrian, Riley County policemen found Lobmeyer in his car in front of apartments at 1941 College Heights Road. The

"He didn't express any problems to us; we wish he would have," Yoder said.

Robert Cathey, district coroner, said the exact amount of carbon monoxide in Lobmeyer's body has not yet been determined, but preliminary test results show there was "certainly enough to be lethal."

"There's no doubt that that was the cause of death," Cathey said.

Eleven mentally handicapped children and adults walked and trotted horses around Weber Arena Sunday afternoon during the KSU Horseman's Association riding clinic.

The clinic participants started out the afternoon watching club members demonstrate how to brush, saddle and bridle horses. The participants then rode horses led by K-State students around the arena.

A game of "Simon Says" was played on horseback with the riders calling out "whoa," making turns or backing up their horses until they were eliminated from the game one by one.

Avenues of Expression

Teaching one of man's oldest professions

The pounding and cutting of clay blocks and the whirl of a potter's wheel sound throughout Angelo Garzio's ceramics classes in the studios of West Stadium.

Garzio, professor of art, has been teaching ceramics at the University since 1957. He conveys an affection for the art that he relates to several other aspects of his life.

"It was love at first sight," the Italian-born artist said of his first experience with ceramics. In 1953 he was exposed to working with clay while doing graduate study in art history at the University of Iowa, Iowa City. During this time Garzio took an elective course in ceramics, and he has been at it ever since.

Ceramics is made by the shaping and firing of clay substances at various temperatures. Clay is a substance found on the surface of the earth or a few feet below, made into a paste with water and heated to a hard form, Garzio said.

Clay is one of the cheapest substances known to man, he said.

"Pottery making is one of man's oldest professions. The earliest pots made date back to 7000 B.C.

"The wonderful thing about clay is its malleability," Garzio said. "You don't need any tools but your hands to shape it."

The Chinese were the first civilized people to develop a technology of high-fire kilns during the eighth century, he said. A kiln is a brick-lined oven for baking or firing ceramics. The Chinese could achieve temperatures of 2,300 degrees and higher to make porcelain, a hard, white, translucent clay body.

Many of the earliest man-made pots were fired in an open pit kiln, and the pots were used for food preparation, cooking and eating.

"During the last 30 to 40 years, there has been a tremendous change in the contemporary scene of clay," Garzio said. "Much of a potter's work is done primarily for aesthetic self-expression.

"In many areas of the world today, the machine is replacing the potter; consequently, containers used for the home are lifeless and dull."

Garzio said he is encouraged that many young potters continue to work clay in traditional ways.

In a traditional small studio situation, the rhythm of work involves forming the clay into pottery in a period of seven to 10 days. The pottery is dried and fired in a kiln, giving it the initial bisque fire.

Glazed after removal from the bisque kiln, the pots are put back into the kiln for a second and ordinarily higher temperature firing to melt the glaze (glass) on the pot's surface. The cycle of pot-making, loading and firing the kiln, cooling and unloading may take anywhere from two to three weeks, he said.

After 34 years of creating pottery, Garzio continues to find the medium fascinating to work with.

"It (clay) can be frustrating to manipulate at first, but exhilarating when skills are developed," he said. "Clay objects made today are expressive of the political and social scenes and therefore become statements of the milieu of the country."

Garzio said he wonders about the future of ceramics because of the expense and availability of kiln fuel 10-30 years down the road.

"Until the time comes when fuel is difficult to get a hold of, people will always want to use clay," Garzio said.

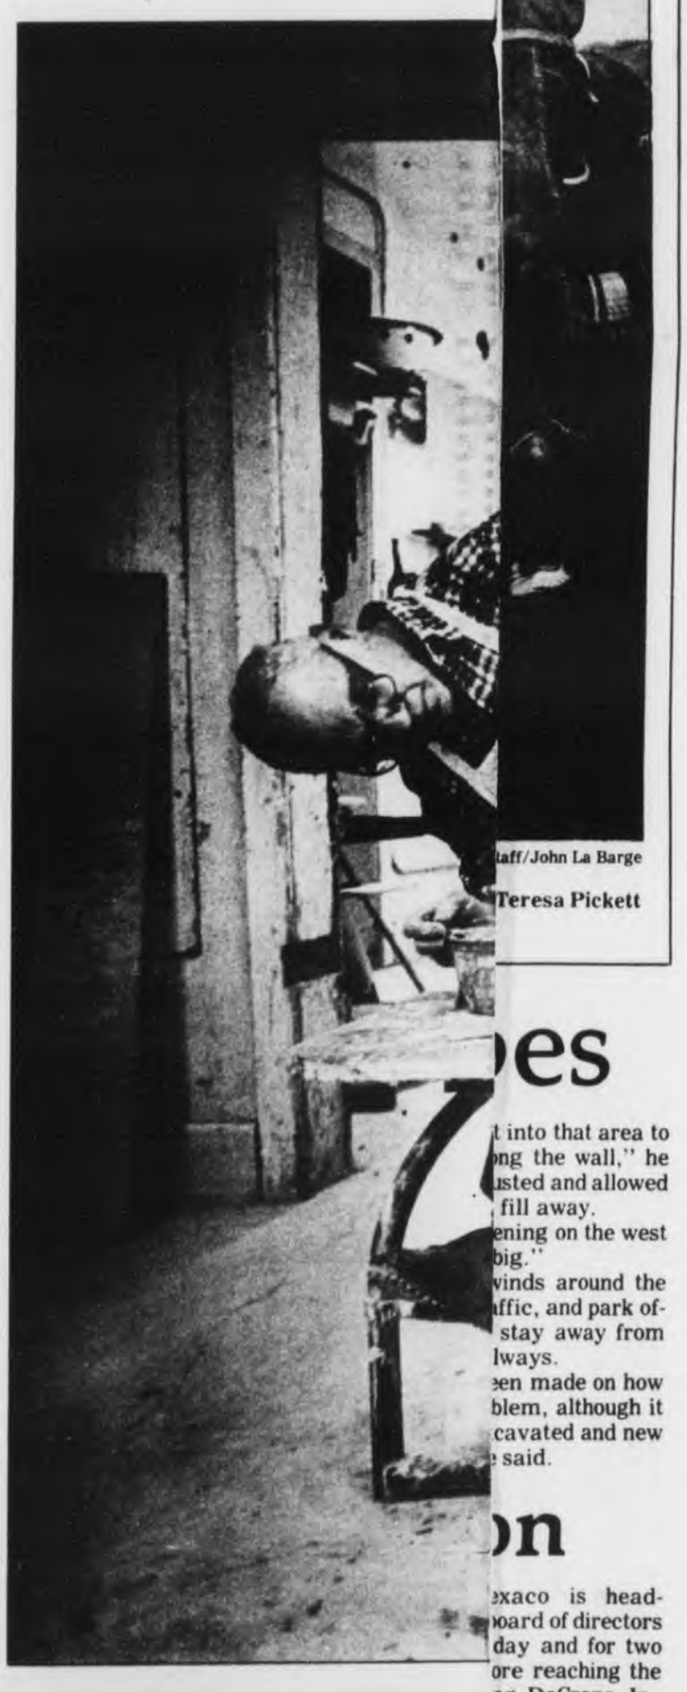
"Nuclear heat, as a source for firing clay objects, is a possibility that hasn't been developed to any extent as of today.

"Today the world is filled with frustrations," Garzio said. "It is much safer to unfrustrate one's frustrations by beating on clay, and eventually ending with a positive statement in clay form rather than to pound on someone else."

Before becoming involved in ceramics at the University of Iowa, Garzio studied at Syracuse University, Syracuse, N.Y. He has traveled throughout Europe, Africa and Asia doing post-graduate study in Italy, Germany and Finland. He was also the recipient of Senior Lectureship Fulbrights to South Korea and Nigeria.

Garzio is currently chairman of the Cultural Arts Committee Kansas Paraguay Partners Inc., a segment of the Partners for the Americas. The organization involves most of the 50 states with Central America and South America.

The first half of Garzio's life has been involved with the creative arts. He said he hopes the second half will be spent on his tree farm outside Manhattan "working with nature and natural forces to evolve an environment beneficial to both the mind and body."



"Man has lost sight of the harm being done to nature," Garzio said. "One hundred years from now we may have a different type of race because of the pollutants on the land. Man has raped the environment, forests, prairies, lakes and waterways because of greed and lust for power."

Garzio has developed the tree farm to "help nature maintain a sane balance with man and natural things."

"Trees help to purify air and cut down erosion. They also add beauty to man's environment and food for the wildlife and himself," he said. "Hopefully I can do something to make the world a better place for my children and their children through this new avenue of expression."

Working on the farm is good for the mind and body, Garzio said. "The world is on a mad merry-go-round. We are forgetting why we were put on this blessed earth of ours.

"We need to worry less about power, profit and 'me,' and more about our neighbors and their welfare."

Garzio believes that working with clay (frustrating in the beginning, but exhilarating w skills of the craft are mastered.

Film Review

'Good Girls' demonstrates life's lunacy

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

It's only fitting that Roger Corman's New World Pictures is distributing "Nice Girls Don't Explode" because this film is occasionally sparked by the same inspired lunacy of Corman's low budget schlock masterpiece of 1960 "The Little Shop of Horrors."

"Nice Girls" is never as good as "Little Shop"; its slapstick humor is absolutely awful. But the story itself is a beguiling mixture of farcical comedy and surrealism without any pretense of artistic merit.

It's about a teen-age girl named April Flowers who causes her surroundings to spontaneously burst into flames whenever she's sexually excited. When her mother (played by Barbara Harris) asks her "Have you packed some protection?" before April steps out on a date, she's not talking about contraceptives. Poor April must carry a small fire extinguisher in her purse in case her date accidentally catches fire.

But as we soon find out, April isn't actually starting the fires herself. Her mother is to blame. Mom is so scared of losing her precious daughter that she sets off fireballs by remote control and says if April ever makes love April will undoubtedly explode. This makes for a deliriously absurd metaphor for sexual repression.

The story really gets cooking when April meets her childhood boyfriend, Andy. He's hoping for a college scholarship so he can go to China and study pingpong. He refuses to believe the baloney about April telekinetically starting fires, so he looks for the real cause.

This plot is so nutty and Chuck Martinez's direction is so stylized that many people will unfortunately think "Nice Girls" is an incredibly bad movie. For those people who like their movies respectable and proper, "Nice Girls" will seem like the work of morons with cameras, but there is a weird brand of rationale that motivates all the action in the film.

It's as if the movie takes place on a different planet, a place that looks similar to our world but where everything is either sugary sweet or downright sinister — nothing in between.

Unlike those really awful low budget movies of the '50s ("Robot Monster" and "Plan 9 from Outer Space") that have now become cult classics because their ineptitude elicits howls of laughter, "Nice Girls" asks us to laugh along with it, instead of at it. Examples of this are obvious in the sequence where Mom scurries after her daughter, plastic explosives in one hand and an electronic detonator in the other, or in the scene where Andy kisses April and Mom tries to convince them the kiss made the family cat burst into flames.

Filmed on a super low budget here in Kansas (mostly in Lawrence on University of Kansas Department of Theater stages), "Nice Girls Don't Explode" isn't always successful. Sometimes it's just plain bad, and Chuck Martinez's direction is often clumsy. However, this movie is filled with more enthusiasm than its slim budget can suppress.

Student found dead in auto

By The Collegian Staff

Saturday morning a K-State freshman was found dead in his car after apparently committing suicide.

Stephen Lobmeyer, 18, freshman in pre-medicine from Lakewood, Colo., died in his 1974 Ford Mustang of carbon monoxide poisoning early Saturday morning. Friday, Lobmeyer was arrested by the Riley County Police Department and charged with a DUI before being released on $500 bond.

After being contacted by a pedestrian, Riley County policemen found Lobmeyer in his car in front of apartments at 1941 College Heights Road. The ignition was on, and police found a garden hose running from the exhaust pipe to the interior of the car.

David Yoder, director of Marlatt Hall, where Lobmeyer lived, said a message was found on Lobmeyer's word processor, but the contents have not been released.

Yoder said he believes Lobmeyer killed himself in response to his arrest.

"We believe that to be the event that convinced him to do this," Yoder said. "We did not have any previous reason to suspect that he was a candidate for suicide.

"He didn't express any problems to us; we wish he would have," Yoder said.

Robert Cathey, district coroner, said the exact amount of carbon monoxide in Lobmeyer's body has not yet been determined, but preliminary test results show there was "certainly enough to be lethal."

"There's no doubt that that was the cause of death," Cathey said.

Cathey said the hose was "pinched almost closed," forcing the gas to seep in slowly and probably not killing Lobmeyer for "maybe an hour or so."

Before dying of carbon monoxide poisoning, which creates a lack of oxygen in the body, a person will become unconscious and then comatose, Cathey said.

Four teen-agers in New Jersey and two in Chicago committed suicide by carbon monoxide poisoning last month.

Fire cuts electricity to houses, KSDB

By The Collegian Staff

About 250 homes in the Deep Creek area south of Manhattan were without electrical power for about one hour due to a prairie fire Sunday afternoon.

Clinton Gordon, superintendent of PR&W Electrical Cooperative Association on east U.S. Highway 24 in Wamego, said burning pastures were swept by the wind, setting fire to some cedar trees in the area and burning down one of the main feeder poles supplying electricity to the area. Gordon said the power outage was reported at about 4:50 p.m.

Two crews were sent to Prairie South Housing south of Manhattan on the west side of state Highway 177, the area where the damage was believed to be.

Using chain saws, the crews cut away the burned cedar trees to replace the pole and lines. Electrical power came back at about 6:45 p.m. No fire departments in the area were called to control the fire, Gordon said.

Due to the power outage, KSDB-FM was off the air from 4:50 to 6:55 p.m., said Kelly Amerine, senior in history and political science and disc jockey working Sunday evening.

"Several landowners in the area were burning (pastures) Sunday," he said. "This fire just happened to get caught with the wind and hit the cedar trees and burned down one of our poles.

Gordon said the temporary pole and lines will be replaced today.

A game of "Simon Says" was played on horseback with the riders calling out "whoa," making turns or backing up their horses until they were eliminated from the game one by one.

"I love riding horses," said James, a participant.

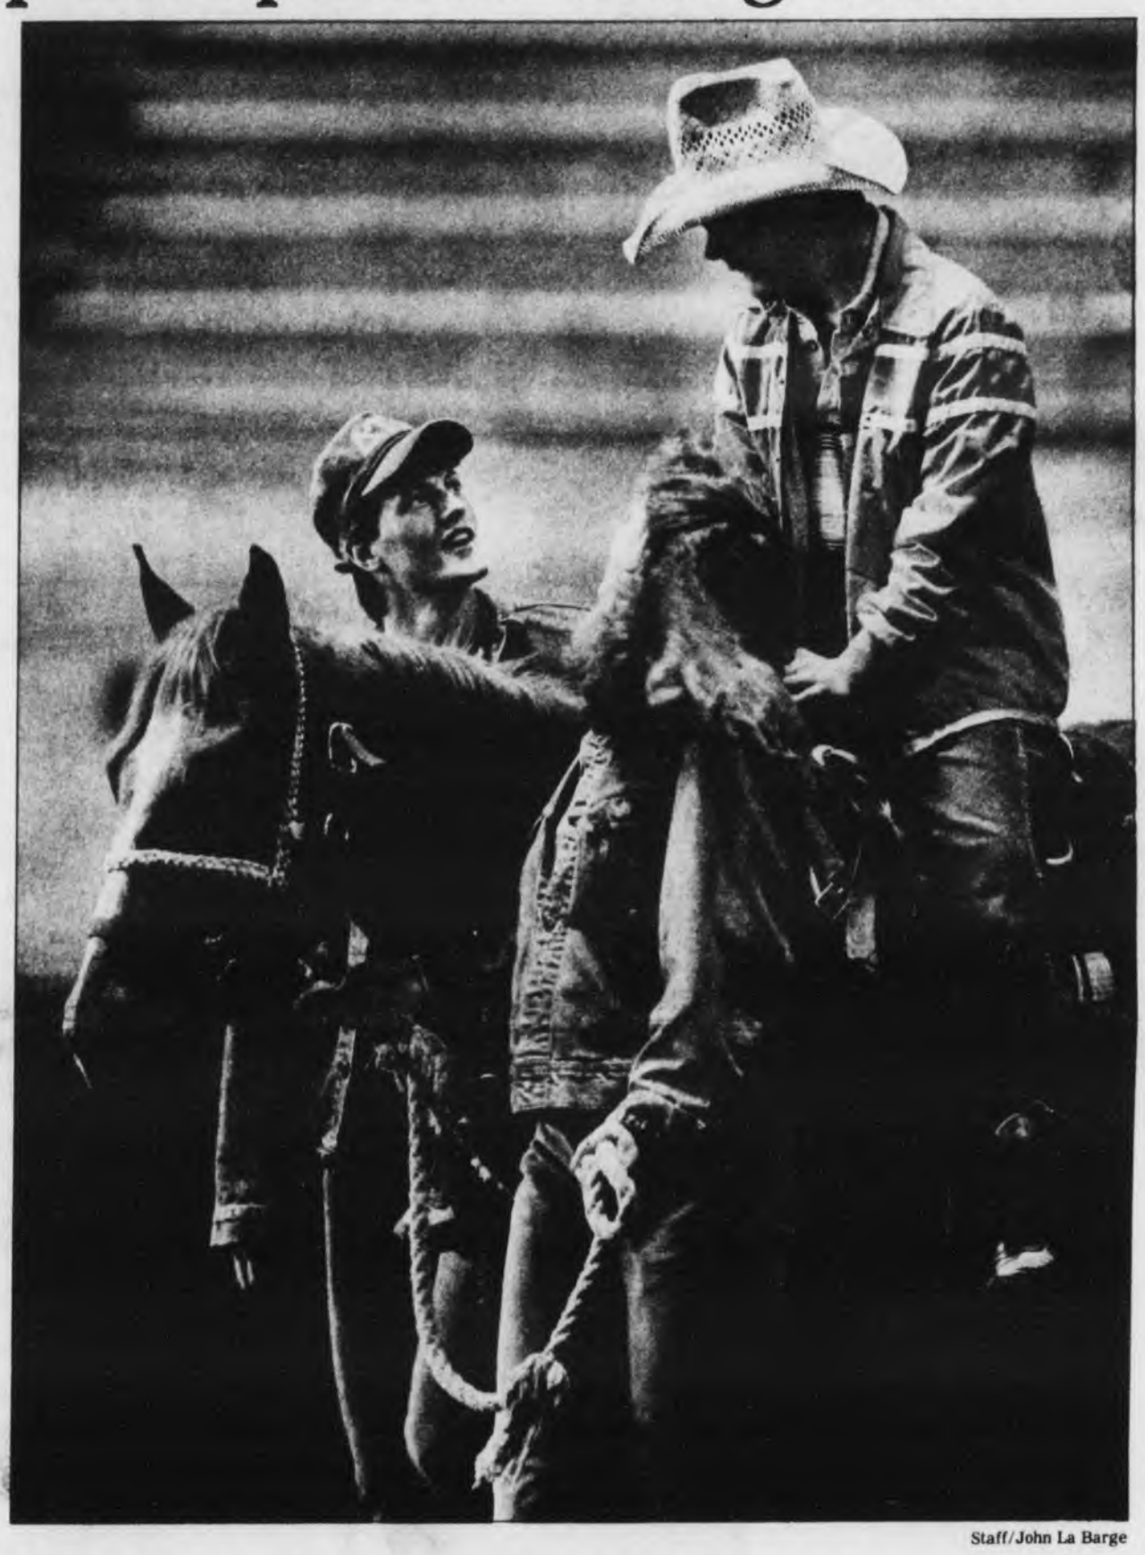
"I want a horse of my own," said Amy, another participant. "I would ride it every day and feed it."

Dennis Sigler, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, said the association has given riding clinics during the spring for the past six years as part of a community service.

"It's a project students are reluctant to do, yet once they get going, they get a lot out of it," Sigler said.

Mark Albin, sophomore in animal sciences and industry, talked to the clinic participants about the content of horse feed and parts of the saddle. He said it was the first time he had helped with such a riding clinic.

"I enjoyed it," Albin said. "I thought it was real rewarding."



Mindy Higdon, senior in animal sciences and industry and riding clinic chairwoman, has helped with the clinic for several years.

"They have so much fun. It's a blast," Higdon said.

Manhattan resident Nancy Erickson, whose son Rod has participated in the riding clinic since the project started six years ago, said Rod enjoys the clinic and doing things with K-State students.

"I think it's great," Erickson said. "Too bad they only get to ride once a year."

Participants were recruited with the help of Deb Engstrom, special education teacher at Manhattan Middle School.

Father wins support of Americans

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Almost three out of four Americans support a judge's decision in the Baby M case to turn the child of a surrogate mother over to her father, according to a poll published Sunday.

The New York Times-CBS News Poll reported that 74 percent of the 1,045 adults interviewed by telephone from April 5 through April 8 said the baby should go to the biological father, William Stern, whose sperm was used.

Fifteen percent said the child known in court as Baby M should go to her surrogate mother, Mary Beth Whitehead.

Whitehead signed a surrogate contract with Stern and his wife Elizabeth, but changed her mind after giving birth.

A New Jersey judge stripped Whitehead of parental rights and ruled that Stern should have custody, and Stern's wife was allowed to adopt the baby, who the Sterns named Melissa.

The New Jersey Supreme Court on Friday reinstated Whitehead's right to visit the baby she calls Sara for two hours a week, pending a decision on her appeal.

Support for Whitehead's custody claim was highest among women who had never been married and women more than 64 years old. But in both groups only 22 percent said the surrogate mother should get the baby.

Sinkhole appears near Tuttle tubes

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

Onlookers viewing the spectacle of both tubes being opened at Tuttle Creek Reservoir Saturday afternoon saw more of the area than expected after a sinkhole developed in the road on the east side of the spillways.

About 2 p.m. a 6-foot square area of the asphalt road collapsed and dropped 17 feet to form a sinkhole 17 feet by 18 feet.

Spectators said the asphalt slowly sank, and a small hole in the middle developed. Seconds later, more of the asphalt roadway cracked and fell into the hole.

Although people were in the area at the time of the collapse, nobody was injured and no property was lost.

A dog belonging to Michael Suleiman, professor of political science, accidentally fell into the hole. The dog was not injured and was rescued about 3½ hours later by park rangers and officers from the Riley County Police Department.

Park rangers were notified of the sinkhole a few minutes after the appearance of the sinkhole. Not knowing what had caused the sinkhole to occur, the rangers closed the east spillway.

"I was down in the state park when somebody stopped me around 2:15 (p.m.) and told me there was a sinkhole in the road," said park ranger Jim Franz.

"It is quite large underneath. What you see here (at the surface) is one-third the size as in the bottom," he said.

Engineers from the district office of the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers arrived to investigate the sinkhole several hours later.

"Basically it is just a drainage problem, and it's not even tied into the dam," said project manager Dale Forge.

"There's a drain pipe put into that area to relieve water pressure along the wall," he said. "The drain pipe has rusted and allowed the water to wash the sand fill away.

"The same thing is happening on the west side, but the hole is not as big."

Much of the road that winds around the tubes has been closed to traffic, and park officials request that people stay away from the general area of the spillways.

No definite plans have been made on how to rectify the drainage problem, although it is likely the area will be excavated and new drainage pipes installed, he said.

Texaco files for bankruptcy, seeks protection

By The Associated Press

NEW YORK — Oil giant Texaco Inc., fighting an $11 billion judgment in favor of Pennzoil Co., filed Sunday for protection from creditors under federal bankruptcy laws. It is the biggest U.S. company to take the drastic step.

The filing under Chapter 11 of the U.S. Bankruptcy Code does not mean Texaco is insolvent and should have little or no effect on its day-to-day operations. But it means Pennzoil will be unable to seize any Texaco assets indefinitely.

Analysts interpreted the move by Texaco, the nation's third-largest oil company, as a tactical measure to stall Pennzoil and pressure the rival into a settlement of their two-year-old court battle, in which Pennzoil accused Texaco of illegally interfering in a planned merger between Pennzoil and Getty Oil Co.

"Pennzoil has placed its own greed above any consideration of fundamental fairness or the public welfare," James Kinnear, Texaco president and chief executive officer, told a New York news conference announcing the Chapter 11 filing. "Pennzoil has bludgeoned Texaco with unreasonable demands."

Kinnear said Texaco was forced to seek bankruptcy-law protection because the Pennzoil judgement was frightening customers and suppliers, and making it harder for Texaco to arrange credit.

Under Chapter 11, a company continues operating but is shielded from creditor lawsuits while it works out a way to pay debts. The company's common stock likely will continue trading, but Texaco said it would immediately suspend stock dividends.

Texaco has been fighting in Texas and federal courts to reverse a 1985 ruling in favor of Pennzoil and to lower an order that it post security equal to the $8.5 billion judgment and interest.

"Pennzoil thought we took Getty Oil away from them unfairly. We believe we won Getty fair and square," said Kinnear. He called the move "a most difficult, painful and wrenching decision...however, we had no choice in the matter."

With $35 billion in assets, Texaco is the largest U.S. company to ever file for Chapter 11 protection. The previous record was held by Penn Central Corp., which had $7 billion in assets when it sought Chapter 11 protection in 1970.

Baine Kerr, chairman of Pennzoil's executive committee and former president of the company, said he was surprised by Texaco's move.

"It shows in my judgment an arrogance and disregard for the whole judicial process and an attempt to use the bankruptcy laws improperly." said Kerr, lead negotiator for Pennzoil in talks with Texaco over a compromise on the security order.

Texaco would have had "no difficulty in putting up sufficient security to complete the requirements of the law," Kerr said.

"We have said all along we would not insist on the whole amount, and they could pledge collateral and other type of security for approximately half the judgment and for the balance we would rely on covenants they would give," Kerr said.

The action was filed shortly before noon Sunday in federal bankruptcy court in White Plains, N.Y., where Texaco is headquartered. The company's board of directors met for seven hours Saturday and for two hours Sunday morning before reaching the decision, according to Alfred DeCrane Jr., chairman of the board.

"We felt action was necessary before the markets open tomorrow," said DeCrane.

Asked about analysts' predictions that a reorganization would cause Texaco stock to dive, Kinnear predicted it would bounce back after the public realizes the subsidiaries are not affected.

Pennzoil is expected to be among those most hurt by Texaco's filing for reorganization because it will be relegated to the status of just another unsecured creditor.

Texaco officials stressed that the action should have no affect on consumers, because the subsidiaries that market consumer products are not included in the bankruptcy action.

"The Texaco star and the efficient units which hang that star in front of them...are

Evacuated residents return home

PITTSBURGH — About 16,000 residents evacuated from the city's East End because of fumes leaking from a derailed railroad car were allowed to return home Sunday after workers safely removed the tank car's deadly chemical cargo.

"Come on back. Come on home. The area's safe," Margaret Rizza, a spokeswoman for the city Public Safety Department, said after Mayor Richard Caliguiri declared the emergency over just after 4 p.m.

The tanker was among 34 railroad cars that toppled off the tracks when a Conrail freight train en route to Chicago derailed and plowed into another freight train headed in the opposite direction Saturday afternoon.

No serious injuries had been reported by Sunday, although 14 people were treated at hospitals for breathing problems immediately after the derailment.

People living within 2.6 miles of the accident were advised to leave their homes immediately, but were allowed back six hours later after the leak was plugged. They were told to be out of the area again by noon Sunday, when emergency crews would attempt to remove the derailed tanker.

Shortly after midnight, however, the chemical began seeping again from the tanker and East End residents were awakened by wailing sirens and police bullhorns.

Batted ball kills wayward dove

NEW YORK — A wayward dove flying in short left field at Shea Stadium helped the Atlanta Braves score two runs against the New York Mets on Sunday.

It was the first bird killed by a batted ball in major league history, according to the Elias Sports Bureau, a sports information company.

Dion James, leading off the third inning, lofted what appeared to be a routine fly to left field off Mets' pitcher Bobby Ojeda. But as left fielder Kevin McReynolds moved into position to catch the ball, it struck the dove and landed about 50 feet in front of him as James cruised into second.

The bird was killed and dropped to the ground. Shortstop Rafael Santana picked up the bird and handed it to the ball girl.

Two outs later, Dale Murphy homered to right for two Atlanta runs. The Braves went on to win 12-4.

In 1981, Elias said, Eric Davis of Eugene hit a ball that struck and killed a bird during a game in the Class A Northwest League. The ball was caught by outfielder Ron Harrison of Medford. Davis now plays for the Cincinnati Reds.

In 1983, a ball thrown by Dave Winfield of the New York Yankees killed a seagull in Toronto.

"My second bird," said Craig Nettles of the Braves, who was with the Yankees in 1983. "Only in New York."

Apparent 'prank' kills 1 in dorm

DOVER, Del. — A fire in a Wesley College dormitory was started early Sunday by a smoke bomb, which apparently was set off as a prank, and an 18-year-old student died when he was trapped in his room by smoke, police said.

Four others were injured, one critically, police said. Two students were arrested in connection with the fire, which started between 2 a.m. and 2:30 a.m. in Williams Hall at the downtown Dover campus, according to police.

The smoke bomb was set off on the second floor of the dorm, according to the police report. The device started a small fire, and firefighters evacuated the smoke-filled buiding.

One room had heavy damage, and the rest of the building was heavily damaged by smoke, police said. It was not known how many people were inside the building.

Election unseats Fiji prime minister

SUVA, Fiji — Prime Minister Ratu Sir Kamisese Mara, who has led Fiji since independence from Britain in 1970, was unseated in national elections Sunday by a coalition that wants to ban visits by nuclear-capable ships.

The coalition led by Dr. Timoci Bavadra, a family planning expert, won 28 seats in the 52-seat Parliament. Mara's Alliance Party took 24 seats. The eight-day election ended Saturday and vote-counting concluded on Sunday.

Bavadra, 52, heads the multiracial Fiji Labor Party, which formed an alliance with the Indian-dominated National Federation Party.

In the old Parliament, Mara's party had 28 seats, the National Federation Party 22 and a small party, the Western United Front, two.

"You have given your decision," Mara, 66, told voters in a resignation statement. He urged his supporters to work for the good of Fiji and not "hold rancor or be bitter" about the outcome of the elections.

Crowd greets pope in Argentina

BUENOS AIRES, Argentina — Nearly a million cheering people waved olive branches and palm fronds in a joyous greeting to Pope John Paul II, the first modern pontiff to celebrate the Palm Sunday Mass outside Rome.

On his last day of a two-week South American pilgrimage, the pope led the Roman Catholic ceremony from an altar on a canopied platform three stories above the 360-foot-wide Ninth of July Avenue running through this capital.

Later Sunday, the pope told Roman Catholic leaders of the Argentine Episcopal Conference that the church acted courageously during Argentina's 1976-83 military dictatorship.

"I know of your constant efforts and preocupation in difficult moments, in the violence that caused profound pain and death," John Paul said. "I know that your courageous endeavors saved lives."

Hayden 'wins as many as he loses'

TOPEKA — Mike Hayden's scorecard for his first legislative session as governor shows mixed results.

While Hayden suffered some highly visible defeats — primarily on the death penalty — he also could claim some substantive victories on tough issues.

The final grades won't be posted on Hayden's report card until after the Legislature's wrapup session which begins April 29.

Based on issues finalized so far, he appears to be playing about .500 ball — winning about as many as he loses.

On the plus side, Hayden won legislative acceptance of his plan for merging the Fish and Game Commission and Park and Resources Authority into a new Department of Wildlife and Parks; succeeded in blocking income tax reform on grounds it would be better to wait a year to see if some or all of a state windfall can be returned to taxpayers, and got legislation he wanted to implement the liquor, lottery and pari-mutuel wagering amendments.

He also persuaded the Legislature to hold off on a major highway construction program until his task force proposes a comprehensive plan, and he got the spending cuts he wanted to restore fiscal stability to state government.

Hayden's most painful defeat, unquestionably, was Senate rejection of a bill the House passed to reinstate capital punishment in Kansas.

"My only real disappointment is the failure of capital punishment to pass," the governor conceded at a post-session news conference Saturday.

Graphic design seniors display 'humorous' art

By ERIN MULCAHY
Collegian Reporter

"Aesthetic Distortions in America" are expressed in a Bachelor of Fine Arts senior exhibit currently on display in McCain Auditorium.

Artwork in the show, which will be displayed until April 24, was created by graphic design seniors Connie Carriker, Jan Kubik, Kerry Lenhart, Rob Millan, Donna Osborne and Rita Waldmann.

"We wanted something a little different," Lenhart said of the exhibit's theme. "We looked for humor — it's our senior year, and we wanted to have fun. Anything with humor, people like it." The theme was used on publicity posters and invitations publicizing the event.

Some features of the exhibit include photography illustration pieces, sculptures and three dimensional artwork.

"Most of the designs are out of the ordinary," Millan said. "All of the graphic designers going into this show have a future in graphic design. You will see some of the best K-State has to offer."

"There is a lot of University work," Lenhart said. "Everyone works in different places and has printed work from internships also."

All seniors in graphic design are required to show their artwork in an exhibition in order to graduate.

"Instead of writing a thesis paper, you put on a show," Lenhart said.

"A lot of people don't even know where the Art Building is, or what graphic design is," Kubik said of her field of study. "The show is cultural — you might learn something."

Lenhart said many of the graphic design graduates would like a career as a creative art director.

"A lot of people come to school with artistic talents and don't realize you can get good jobs doing it," Lenhart said. "There's more money and more authority in a director position."

"The work put into the show, and learning how to deal with the public and how they view me" is one aspect of what Millan learned from exhibition work.

Fraternity relays aid Olympics

By The Collegian Staff

And it's off to the races.

Instead of horses pulling chariots, however, greek members pulled the two-wheeled vehicles Friday afternoon at R.V. Christian Track competing in the 24th annual Lambda Chi Alpha Chariot Relays.

Each year Lambda Chi fraternity members sponsor the relays in an effort to raise money for the Kansas Special Olympics. This year, 20 houses, paying a $75 entry fee, participated in the oldest all-greek philanthropy at K-State.

Chariot pullers from Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity and a chariot rider from Kappa Alpha Theta sorority won in the men's division with a time of 53.05 seconds. In the women's division, a new category this year, Gamma Phi Beta sorority and a chariot rider from Pi Kappa Phi fraternity won in a time of 1:13.

"Each fraternity entered is paired up with a sorority and they pick four runners to compete as their team," said Darren Lippe, sophomore in marketing and Chariot Relays coordinator. "The sorority they are teamed with then picks a rider to ride in the chariot."

Lippe said the newly added women's division is run the same way as the men's except with a fraternity rider. A women's competition was added to allow more greek houses to participate and give the sororities a larger part in the relays, he said.

"We wanted to get them more involved," he said. "(The sorority members) enjoyed it."

A longstanding record time held by the Beta Theta Pi fraternity of 50.8 seconds set in 1969 still has not been broken. Last year's title was held by Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity and Alpha Gamma Delta sorority.

International buyers examine U.S. markets

By KARI COMPTON
Collegian Reporter

For the past two weeks, 18 international grain buyers from 12 countries visited campus to attend an International Grains Program short course on the U.S. grain marketing system.

The course participants were either members of government buying agencies or private owners of wheat and feed grain mills.

Harvey Kiser, coordinator of the IGP short course and associate professor of agricultural economics, said the course was designed to provide information about U.S. grain markets so international buyers will be more aware about how to buy to meet their needs.

"The goal of this program is to give (the participants) more information about our grain market so the small buyer can become a larger buyer and the occasional buyer will become a repeat buyer," said Roger Johnson, associate director of IGP.

The two-week program is being conducted in cooperation with the U.S. Wheat Associates, the U.S. Feed Grains Council, the American Soybean Association and the Kansas corn, sorghum, soybean and wheat commissions.

"The course is short but intensive," Kiser said. "They spend more hours in the classroom in two weeks than the average student spends in a three-hour class all semester."

Topics covered in the two-week program include grain supply and demand situations, the impact of farm policies on grain prices, ocean transportation, grading and inspection, and contracting of grain.

The course is designed to help them "gain an understanding for our system and quality," Kiser said.

Related topics include wheat and corn milling, and feed manufacturing, Kiser said.

Countries involved were Spain, the Dominican Republic, Mexico, Peru, Colombia, Bolivia, Korea, Japan, Indonesia, Malaysia, Sri Lanka and Pakistan.

Field trips to Enid, Okla., and Kansas City, Mo., were also included in the program. The group toured the Union Equity Cooperative Exchange and the Enid Grain Inspection Co. facilities in Oklahoma April 5-7.

Kiser said participants were introduced to the different grain merchandising techniques for both inland terminal elevators and international exports.

Kiser said the participants learned the grain elevators do mostly direct merchandising in the United States, and they tend to do mostly indirect trading in the international scene through other international traders using their storage bins.

During the group's tour of the inspection agencies, they were shown the intricacies of grain inspection and sorting, Johnson said.

The Enid field trip was sponsored by the Oklahoma Wheat Commission.

The program concluded with the second field trip to Kansas City April 9-10. The group toured the Farmers Union Co-op Business Association in St. Marys, the Federal Reserve Bank and the Kansas City Board of Trade, both in Kansas City, Mo.

Kiser said touring the Federal Reserve Bank was an important stop on the field trip because the participants saw the role of a central banking institution in the international marketing of grain.

"Many of these people have to work closely with the central bank in their own country to get the money to do any purchasing of grain," Kiser said. "It will be important for them to see how our banking system works."

U.S. shouldn't tolerate Israeli attache choice

Once again, the United States is looking the other way as Israel abuses the privileged relationship it has with Capitol Hill.

Several months ago, Israel appointed Maj. Gen. Amos Yaron as the Israeli defense attache for the United States. The U.S. government accepted Yaron in this position without question and in full awareness that the appointment of Yaron violates the Four Geneva Conventions of 1949, of which the United States is a signatory. Yaron is guilty of crimes against humanity and is therefore subject to prosecution under the terms of the Geneva Conventions.

In Israel in 1983, an investigative commission headed by Yitzhak Kahan, Israel's chief justice, found Yaron — who at the time was senior military officer in Beirut — to be fully aware of the two-day-long massacre of innocent civilians at the Sabra and Shatilla refugee camps in September 1982. Having the power to stop the massacre, he chose not to and allowed more than 1,000 men, women and children to be slaughtered.

The United States has in the past taken a strong stand against persons found to have committed war crimes or crimes against humanity. In 1976, Maj. Nino Gavazzo was not accepted as Uraguay's military attache to the United States because he was believed to have tortured prisoners.

Also, South Africa's military attache was expelled from the United States on May 24, 1986, as a formal protest against his country's raids against Botswana and Zimbabwe. As a signatory of the terms of the Geneva Conventions, the United States is obligated to demand prosecution of persons involved in crimes against humanity.

Why, then, is Yaron exempt from prosecution — especially since his own country pointed his crime out to the world? Yaron is not so different from a man now on trial in Israel who is also accused of crimes against humanity — John Demjanjuk. Demjanjuk, an auto worker from Cleveland, was whisked away to Israel a few months ago under charges that he is really "Ivan the Terrible," a Nazi guard from the World War II Treblinka death camp.

Like Demjanjuk, Yaron must also be tried for his alleged crimes and, if found guilty, punished. But instead, what happens? Yaron is assigned to one of the most important diplomatic posts in the Israeli military — Washington, D.C.

Canada was also assigned Yaron as its Israeli defense attache as well, but at least it had the decency to refuse his bloody diplomatic credentials.

Topeka school district is segregated by class

In 1954, a group of parents in Topeka filed suit against the Topeka Board of Education in an effort to desegregate public schools. Last Thursday, 23 years after the original suit, U.S. District Judge Richard D. Rogers ruled that the Topeka public schools were integrated and that vestiges of segregation of black and white students had been gradually eliminated.

However, the plaintiffs, a group of parents of 17 black children, remained unconvinced — and not without reason. In fact, a racial imbalance between schools does remain in the Topeka public school system.

Rogers claimed, however, this imbalance is neither intentional nor unconstitutional.

In recognizing this imbalance, it would seem both the judge and plaintiffs have failed to acknowledge another equally important issue — class segregation. It is a fact that areas with high concentrations of minorities — whether black, Hispanic or whatever — are also areas of lower than average income.

The courts have mandated that schools must meet certain quotas of minority enrollment, but they have set no laws requiring integration according to income. By refusing to acknowledge the existence of economic classes, the courts have, in effect, said we should allow a certain number of racial minorities to receive better educations in predominantly white schools, but that it is not important for lower-income and working-class children to get a good education.

Unfortunately, in this country the issue of economic class is usually a non-issue. Until Americans wake up to the existence of economic classes, there will probably be more cases of racial desegregation in which the quotas set by the courts will prove insufficient for a genuinely integrated school system.

Debating mediocrity

Education a hallmark of K-State

MARK BUYLE
Guest Columnist

This guest column is in response to Patti Paxson's "words of wisdom" in Tuesday's Collegian ("Tide of mediocrity swelling at K-State"). It took me all of two paragraphs to realize it was Paxson's column, rather than K-State, that comes closer to mediocrity.

Paxson complains that she refuses to pay her hard-earned money to support the K-State athletic program. Sorry, Paxson, but you're one of the few at this University to have those sentiments. Whether or not we want to admit it, one reflection of a school's prosperity is its success in intercollegiate athletics and there is little dispute this success brings in students and results in national exposure for the University.

Therefore, your small expenditure now is an investment in the future of K-State and a source of tremendous University pride (for most). Even with all of this "wasted" money, K-State has consistently been listed as one of the best buys among American colleges.

If this is the small price I have to pay to have one of the top 32 men's basketball teams in the nation, a Big Eight championship women's basketball team and two of the top 20 cross country teams in the nation with a majority of their funds coming from private contributions earmarked for athletics, I say the students of K-State are getting a real bargain.

As far as faculty salaries are concerned, I agree ours are far below par, but it is a terribly misguided notion to believe this is any fault of the University. The state Legislature and the Kansas Board of Regents have the authority over how much our faculty get paid.

The extent of the University's impact upon these salaries is limited to the constant attempts by faculty representatives, administrators and students to lobby for the needed change. The fact that our excellent faculty members remain at K-State, despite receiving less competitive wages, signifies their intense commitment to maintaining the high quality of education that has traditionally existed.

Finally, Paxson made note of the abundance of horror stories of unqualified graduate students educating our students. When wondering if this is consistent with the "education I paid for," I'll offer a couple of responses. First, the Graduate School and each of the graduate programs at the University are very selective in their admission of students.

Second, the courses these graduate students are teaching are usually classes where a faculty member conducts an accompanying lecture session and are always the very basic level offerings. I question whether a Ph.D. is required to instruct a class in English Composition I. Lastly, by offering the graduate students this experience in teaching at the college level, they become better prepared to advance in their understanding of higher education and other faculty members are allowed more time to devote to teaching their upper-level classes and furthering their research.

In sum, K-State is a remarkable institution with policies very much in sync with the concept of quality in education. President Jon Wefald should have read Paxson's column and been consoled in the fact that the priorities he and his administration have established will do a great deal to serve the objectives of the University. How can one possibly question the quality of the education offered by K-State?

Our College of Business Administration is ranked in the top 15 percent in the nation; our College of Agriculture and its extension service are unsurpassed in their quality of instruction, research and contribution to Kansas; our College of Education graduates more teachers than any other Kansas university; our College of Veterinary Medicine is considered to be one of the best in the nation; our College of Arts and Sciences continues to offer a strong liberal base in the sciences and the arts; we've had more Truman scholars than any other public university; and K-State has been labeled the "Rhodes capital of Kansas."

Well, Paxson, if this is mediocrity then the other 90 percent of America's universities are in real bad shape.

Mark Buyle is a junior in marketing.

Lest we get content...

University falls short of perfect

PATRICK MUIR
Collegian Columnist

During the last few weeks, I have been accused of being too optimistic about K-State. The enthusiasm has worked out well for me since I worked out a deal to get a 3 percent profit off all bumper stickers sold at the Union this semester, and I'm not even part of the administration. The surprising thing is that this criticism is not just coming from University of Kansas students. It seems some of you think there is plenty of room for improvement on this campus.

Well, the summer is coming upon us to offer plenty of time to change some things before we get back next fall. This week I have a few suggestions to make K-State a better place to live during our absence this summer and beyond.

First of all, something has to be done about the new post office location in that remote bastion of activity Dykstra Hall. We keep talking about the importance of retention but this change is inconsistent. Let's think of all the homesick freshmen we will be hampering by making it so difficult to post their letters and packages.

If the administration insists on hiding away the post office over there it is only fair to drop our Concepts of P.E. requirement. This action would be appropriate since we will all be getting more than our fair share of exercise walking over there. Maybe we could get tips from KU on setting up a bus system to shuttle people over there.

Another area for cosmetic improvement is the K-State memorabilia available at the Union. Have you seen some of those T-Shirts they are selling? One of them boasts "The Kansas State Milking Team" incorporated into a cow design. It's bad enough somebody is making such trash while perpetuating an overused stereotype, but why are we selling it? Sounds like a subversive KU plot.

The most irritating feature that could easily be removed this summer are those cheap white chain fences spattered around campus. I realize this recommendation might have come from the animal sciences and industry department, but what exactly are they afraid we will do if we get on the grass? I would like to assure whomever responsible that all we want to do is walk on the grass, not masticate it. Their purpose seems to be to prevent unsightly "cow paths" but the fences are more unsightly than the paths, guys.

I'm also concerned that the campus police's motivation might be down since its longtime photographic hobby has been discontinued. From outside appearances, it seems that they could do with a little exercise. We either need to donate a Jane Fonda workout tape or, better yet, make them hand deliver their mail to Dykstra Hall.

Of course there are a few little things that could be taken care of with little effort. Would somebody please donate some new album covers to be displayed in the Union Catskeller ? The '70s were really scary for me, and I just can't study with a "Best of Bread" album staring me in the face.

It also appears apparent that somebody needs to restrict some of the personals in the classified section. Some of this begging for dates is just too depraved. If you guys are that hard up, spend your spare time developing a personality instead of wasting your time basing relationships on Mazdas, blue sweaters and red hair. I remember the good old days hearing what AXO Pat was up to each week. Let's do something about this so Ed Meese doesn't have to.

And last but not least, since I know you are all waiting for it, we could repaint the purple trash cans this summer. I know many of you would join me in volunteering for this noble effort. The word around Anderson Hall is that odds are 3-to-1 this year's choice will be flourescent orange so that not a soul will be able to miss them.

I am sure there are a lot more things that would make life easier but these are simply not feasible. For instance, Greek Follies' comedians could be funny and our rival university might develop a sense of humor. But I would rather have these few things taken care of over the summer.

A Night At The CIRCUS

Eyes turned toward the top of Ahearn Field House, the crowd waited anxiously for the human cannonball to explode from the depth of the cannon, wondering if he could maneuver his body between the banners and scoreboard that posed as obstacles en route to the safety net.

Friday night was family night in Manhattan. More than 5,000 people gathered for an evening of fun and excitement at the annual Shrine Circus.

"We were really pleased with it," said William Denholm, representative for the Manhattan Shrine Club and circus promotion. "For one performance, this was the most we ever had."

This year's attendance was higher than previous years because only a single performance was held, he said. The change of location to Ahearn from Weber Arena seemed to please everyone, Denholm said.

Families filed into Ahearn quickly to get the best seats. Half an hour before the show, the stands were filling up. To pass the time, children rode the elephant and bounced in the "Moonwalk."

The lions and tigers were brought to the center ring before the show began. Children chattered excitedly about how "scary and big" the animals were. The big cats were obviously a favorite with the kids.

The ringmaster in his black top hat and tails stepped into the spotlight and called his greeting to the crowd, "Ladies and gentlemen, boys and girls..."

The three center rings were alive with moving lights. A canopy of lights on the balconies brought a wave of appreciative response from the spectators.

The first act to catch the crowd's attention was Bersoni's wild animals in the center ring. Lions, tigers, spotted leopards and a black panther were trained to jump through rings. The trainer mastered the big cats with ease as he carried them back to their cages on his shoulders, much to the amazement of the audience.

At the top of Ahearn a motorcycle daredevil raced through space on a wire. Spinning in circles on the thin wire and performing a headstand down the length of the wire, he kept the crowd in awe.

"The latest technology out of Detroit, Jorge's unpredictable car," the ringmaster called.

A Charlie Chaplin figure struggled to start his independent-minded car. Upon starting it he jumped into the seat only to have the engine fail. He lifted the hood of the car, and the engine exploded, flames flying.

The ringmaster announces an act Friday during the two-hour show.

Next he gave a sip of whiskey to himself and the car, both shimmying to the crowd's delight.

Motorcycle daredevils rode in "Jordan's Globe of Death." Two motorcycles shot around in the globe at neck-breaking speeds, avoiding, by a hair, collisions and a woman standing in the middle of the globe.

Always a favorite under the big top, the performing elephants danced and did headstands with surprising grace.

Lilly Rosella, otherwise known as Ra-Tonga, performed with her leashed leopards as a member of the Carden International Circus. She has been with the troupe for two years.

Rosella and the circus group spend nine months out of the year performing. They spend winters at their homes in Florida.

The life as a circus performer is "fun and exciting" to Rosella. She said she does have time for herself, contrary to what would be expected.

The circus group arrived in Manhattan at 7:30 a.m. Friday. They spent most of the day setting up for the evening's performance. Rosella said she took time out to walk to Aggieville.

"I like to relax before I start to work," she said.

"We go to Salina and the first performance is at 10:30 a.m. No one will sleep tonight; we drive and set up," Rosella said.

"The best crowd for me is when there are a lot of kids. They're fun," she said. "They look up to you."

Family members make up most of the circus acts — a lot of circuses are all family, Rosella said.

"I love performing, and I love my cats," Rosella said, adding that she wouldn't consider doing anything else.

As ground workers set up the net for the grand finale, two clowns stumbled and bumbled with a balloon. Blowing whistles at the crowds in the stands, they had spectators clapping and shouting at their command.

"Captain Circus," the human cannonball, was to be the final act. Disguised in a blue cape and red mask, the human cannonball was to fly high above Ahearn.

With a thunderous boom that startled many people, the human cannonball flew high in the air, landing safely on the net.

After two and a half hours of continous entertainment, families left the circus carrying sleepy children, all with memories of when the circus came to town.

Adults and children enjoy watching circus performers high above the Ahearn Field House floor. More than 5,000 people gathered for the thrills of the 25-display, two-hour show performed by the Shrine Circus during its annual visit to Manhattan.

Circus gains new cast

By TOM DENZEL
Collegian Reporter

The Royal Lichtenstein Circus returned to K-State Friday afternoon performing antics and eliciting laughter from a crowd gathered between the Union and Seaton Hall.

This year the circus presented a new cast of performers in a succession of fast-paced juggling, comedy, magic and animal acts. The hour-long show included domestic and exotic trained monkeys and parrots along with two narrated mime fables.

"We always use the audience as part of our routine, that's half the fun," Nick Weber, ringmaster and founder of the circus, said of the nearly 100 observers. "Making people laugh is our business. I have wanted to do this since I was 5 years old.

"I do this to survive, in every sense of the word," he said.

The circus was sponsored by the American Baptist, Ecumenical Christian, Lutheran, Roman Catholic and St. Francis Episcopal campus ministries, said Dave Stewart of the American Baptist Campus Ministry.

"It's been a delight to be able to schedule the circus once again for people young and old to enjoy," he said.

'Making people laugh is our business.'
—Nick Weber

This year's narrated mime fable included "Ploughsharing," a story of monarchs reigning in different countries who discover new compatibility among the people.

"It's like the right stuff," Weber said.

Another fable was a story of how a young man frees a neighborhood from paralytic fear with the gift of music. This is a true story that took place in one of America's "roughest and toughest cities — the Bronx of New York," Weber said.

Weber founded the circus 15 years ago. His show features a center ring that is one-fourth the size of a normal circus ring. Weber's circus visits different sections of the country throughout the year and receives traveling money from audience donations.

This year's performances featured juggling by Kelly Robertson, balancing antics by Jody Ellis and comic pantomime by veteran Lichtenstein clown Mitch Kincannon.

"We see this as an invitation to the campus and the community to take a momentary break from the busy routines of everyday life and come to have a laugh, to play and to celebrate," Stewart said. "It's something we need to do more often."

Night's events demonstrate African traditions to audience

Dressed in native African dress, Yemi Chinonge, graduate student in food science, introduces a skit Friday about the rites of puberty and a wedding ceremony in a village. The skit, performed during African Night at CiCo Park, was about the initiation rites of a girl in a small African village.

Members of the African Student Union had an audience of more than 350 on its feet and dancing to the sounds of popular African music at the close of African Night Friday at CiCo Park.

A dinner, fashion show, artifacts display, music and dance, poetry reciting and a short skit of life in an African village comprised the evening's events put on by students representing various African nations.

"God Bless Africa," a commonly sung African anthem, started off the evening as students dressed in native costume served jaloff rice, beef stew, melon seed soup, alele, samp, pumpkin and various other African dishes.

The different fashions modeled by African students displayed the styles, colors and accessories from such countries as Nigeria, Ivory Coast, Cameroon, Swaziland and Uganda. Men, women and small children paraded long flowing robes, gowns, caps and head wraps of brightly dyed cottons, elaborate weaving and beading.

Members recited African poetry which Yemi Ogunrinola, graduate student in food science, said demonstrated that "Africa is such a tremendous continent with a variety of traditions and customs."

Ogunrinola commented on the students' hopes for an end to the hardships suffered by many on their continent.

"We are happy tonight, but we are also sad. We remember our brothers and sisters in South Africa," he said. "There will not be freedom; there will not be peace until a nation is free of any foreign power.

"We continue the struggle; we continue the fight, and with the help of God...Africa will be set free."

The evening continued with lively music, dancing in costume and a skit of the rites of puberty and a wedding ceremony in an African village.

"We tried to put everything we could remember from home into a wedding ceremony in a small African village," said Nabombe Chinonge, graduate student in food science.

When a young girl reaches puberty, she is taken through initiation rites and then expected to act as an adult. Some societies in Africa do not initiate, Chinonge said.

Suitors next show themselves to village elders in hopes of being picked as a husband for the girl. When the groom is chosen, the families of the couple discuss dowries of cattle or other material possessions.

Many sources available for apartment hunting information

By LAUREN BRUNO
Collegian Reporter

Finding an apartment in Manhattan can be confusing, especially if "hunters" don't know their legal rights.

Marlene Scarlett, housing counselor of the Community Housing Resources Board in Topeka, said students should exercise their rights as renters by using local sources to gain information about the availability of apartments and becoming aware of laws involving renting.

Several local sources are available to offer information about off-campus housing and tips concerning students' rights. One of these, the Consumer Relations Board, located in the Student Government Services office in the Union, is a social service that helps students resolve consumer problems and investigates the reputation of a business to help prevent possible problems.

"CRB will provide references on landlords and complexes, and inform students of previous problems," said Kelli Carr, director of CRB and senior in journalism and mass communications.

Two recurring student complaints about landlords are the failures to return deposits and make repairs, she said.

The Residential Landlord-Tenant Act in Kansas states that the landlord may retain a portion of the deposit to cover any damages incurred but must return the remaining portion with an itemized list of damages no later than 30 days after termination of the lease agreement. The landlord may be sued for 1½ times the amount of the deposit for not doing so. The act sets forth basic terms and conditions that are read into all rental agreements.

In addition, Manhattan has a city ordinance requiring the tenant to pay rent to an interest-bearing account placed in care of a third party if the landlord does not respond to a written repair request within 14 days, Carr said. The landlord has three months to use this money for repairs and if such action is not taken, the money is returned to the tenant, she said.

CRB and most apartment complexes strongly recommend renters purchase renters' insurance, because most landlords do not cover the tenant's personal belongings if water or fire damage occurs.

"Our lease has a clause which strongly encourages renters to get personal property insurance, because if there was a fire, our insurance only covers building damage," said Brenda Sewell, leasing assistant of Anderson Place Apartments, 1852 and 1856 Anderson Ave.

Some apartment complexes require lease agreements to begin on the first of the month even when a tenant moves in later in the month. A tenant should ask if it's possible to adjust the rental amount if he or she moves in at another time.

"We require a 12-month written lease agreement which is started on the day of actual move-in, therefore, the lease doesn't have to start on the first of the month and the tenant isn't penalized," Sewell said.

At Anderson Place a one-month deposit is required and is refundable with no interest.

"Kansas has no law which requires the deposit to be placed in an interest-bearing account," she said.

Campus East Apartments, 1428 McCain Lane, also require a one-month deposit, and the amount depends on the rental amount of the apartment, said Dick Thein, manager of Campus East.

Thein said he doesn't accept pets at Campus East because of potential damage to carpets and property of the complex.

"We don't accept pets, and I think most of the newer complexes don't," Sewell said. "The best way to find a place that does accept pets is to call a leasing agent who handles the leasing of homes."

One homeowner said she likes to rent to students and help them by offering lower rental rates and low deposits, but she had problems with tenants and had to make changes to

Services provide renting tips

By The Collegian Staff

The following are suggested questions for renters to ask potential landlords.

— Is a written lease agreement required? When do the lease dates begin and end? What are the penalties for breaking a lease? Are roommates jointly or individually responsible for rent?

— Is a deposit required? How much? Is it refundable? Is interest added to the refunded amount?

— Are utilities included in the rental amount, or are they an additional expense?

— Are pets allowed? Is an additional deposit required when pets live on the premises? Is it refundable?

— Are waterbeds allowed? Is proof of insurance required? Are they restricted to first floor residences only?

— Is the landlord or the tenant responsible for repairs?

— Is the location secure? Are door locks secure?

— What type of damage is insured by management?

— Is subleasing permitted?

— Is the landlord responsible for exterminating for pest control?

The Consumer Relations Board has literature on rights of first-time renters and what to look for when searching for a residence.

Triathlon tests athlete's stamina in 3 sports

By LAUREN BRUNO
Staff Title

A triathlon is not just a friendly competition to some people. For some triathletes, such as Danny Banks, it's a way of life.

Banks, 24, turned pro last year after competing in triathlons for three years. He now makes a full-time career of triathlon competitions — one-day events that consist of running, swimming and bicycling races — and is supported by corporate sponsorship.

"I train 30-40 hours a week, putting 400 miles in on my bike, running 45 miles and swimming 20,000 yards," Banks said.

The second annual Taxi Triathlon, sponsored by Theta Xi fraternity, was held in Manhattan Sunday to benefit multiple sclerosis.

Approximately 220 individuals and teams participated in the event, which consisted of a 700-yard swim in the Natatorium, 14.5-mile bike ride and 3.1-mile run.

Russ Pugh, senior in marketing, started the Taxi Triathlon last year with his fraternity as a way of raising money for multiple sclerosis, the fraternity's philanthropy, said Steve Kummer, sophomore in pre-professional business administration and coordinator of this year's event.

Individual winners were Banks and Liz Bulman in the women's division, another professional triathlete.

Banks defeated defending champion James Witter in a time of 1:05:51, but didn't break Witter's course record of 1:05:11. Banks, no stranger to the rugged competition of a triathlon, placed sixth in the 1985 Iron Man contest held annually in Hawaii, which consists of a 2.5-mile swim, 112-mile bike ride and 26.2-mile run.

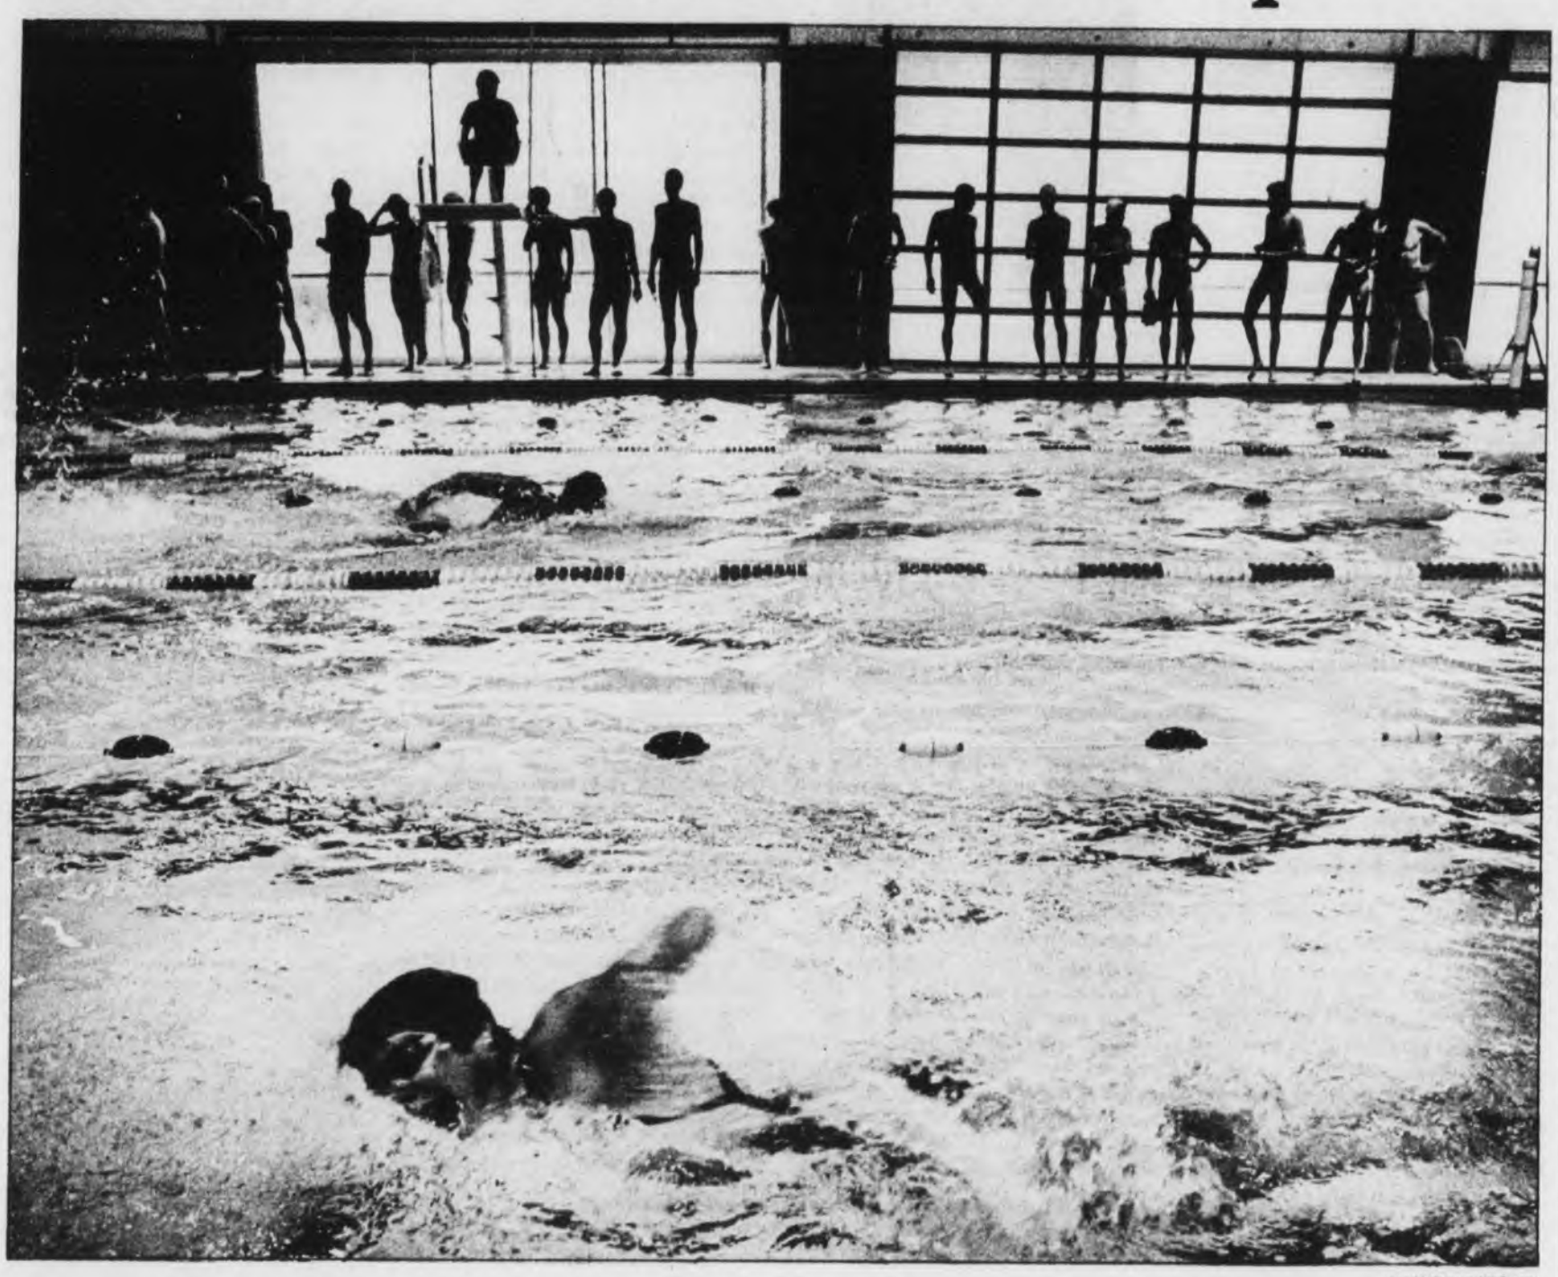
In the women's division, Bulman beat last year's women's record with a time of 1:15:52. She has been a pro-athlete for two years and is ranked one of the top three women triathletes in the country.

Bulman placed second in the 1986 Iron Man and is hoping to take first in the 1987 event. Bulman said she trains between two and six hours a day.

"On the average, I put in 250 miles a week on my bike, 50 miles a week running and swim 22,000 yards," she said.

The winning men's team members were swimmer Andy McIlvaine, freshman in pre-professional business administration; swimmer Jerome Nadel, graduate in industrial psychology; and runner David Pulford, junior in pre-professional business administration.

The team's time was 1:02:13 — 19 seconds shy of beating the course record.



All the winning team members have been recognized for strength in their leg of the triathlon.

Nadel has been riding for five years and is licensed by the United States Cycling Federation, a national sanctioned association for amateur cyclists.

"The cycling leg in a triathlon is comparable to the time trial event in that it's a race against the clock instead of a race against other riders," Nadel said.

Pulford, a member of Theta Xi, was a member of the K-State men's track team last year. McIlvaine was honored at the high school level for his swimming talent.

The mixed relay team winners were swimmer Donna Thorpe, cyclist Mark McIntire and runner Robert Wilkerson with a time of 1:10:10.

Staff/Steve Wolgast

While a participant in the Taxi Triathlon nears the final lap in the first of two pools in which all entrants must swim, others waiting to start the competition Sunday stand in the Natatorium. Danny Banks won the triathlon in 1:05:51; Liz Bulman won the women's division in 1:15:52.

Women golfers to host tournament

The K-State women's golf team is slated to host a four-team tournament today and Tuesday at Rolling Meadows Golf Course near Milford Reservoir and Junction City.

Teams scheduled to participate are K-State, Wichita State, North Dakota and Northeast Missouri State. Tee-off time for the tournament is 9 a.m. both days.

K-State crews compete at Topeka

K-State's crews captured four first-place medals at the President's Regatta held Friday and Saturday on Lake Shawnee near Topeka.

The men's varsity won the 2,000- and 400-meter races while the women's novice team won its race. In singles competition, Jeff Bushey also took first place.

Men golfers capture Nebraska cup

Led by Jeff Sedorcek who placed third individually with an even par 70, the K-State men's golf team won the Nebraska Wesylan Invitational played Friday at Lincoln. The Wildcats carded a 290 and defeated Hastings by five strokes.

K-State's score Friday, combined with the Wildcats' 302 score from Thursday's Creighton Invitational, gave the 'Cats a two-day total of 592 and the championship in the race for the Nebraska Cup.

All-Americans master events at track meet

By The Collegian Staff

All-American tracksters Pinkie Suggs and Kenny Harrison continued their mastery of their respective events at the John Jacobs Invitational Saturday in Norman, Okla.

Suggs, who has reached the national qualifying mark in each meet this outdoor season, continued her streak with throws in the shot put and discus. Her toss of 173-feet-6½ in the discus was good for an NCAA mark and a K-State record.

In the shot put, Suggs' throw of 54-6 was also a national standard distance.

Harrison was equally as impressive with dual victories in the long jump and triple jump. His jump of 54-3 in the triple jump qualified him for the national meet, while his long jump distance of 25-6° took top honors in that competition.

The non-scoring event, hosted by the University of Oklahoma, featured some fine individual performances by the Wildcat teams.

Struckhoff finished first in the 3,000-meter run with a 9:36.4, while Roberson placed second in the 400-meter intermediate hurdles with a 51.42.

K-State's baseball squad discovers how to win in Big Eight

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

After six previous attempts, K-State's baseball team found its way into the winning column in Big Eight Conference play by winning three of four games against the University of Kansas Saturday and Sunday at Frank Myers Field.

K-State won the first doubleheader Saturday 11-6 and 6-4. Sunday, the two teams split with the Jayhawks winning the opener 14-10. The Wildcats outlasted the Jayhawks 6-2 in the nightcap.

"I'm not really satisfied," said K-State Coach Mike Clark of his team's efforts.

"Naturally, you always want to win every game. In the first game (Sunday), we didn't deserve to win. We had a 6-0 lead and let them back in with a couple of walks and errors. You can't do that in the Big Eight."

With the wins, K-State improved to 17-15 overall and 3-6 in conference play. KU dropped to 11-24-1 overall and 1-11 in the Big Eight.

With the wins, K-State improved to 17-15 overall and 3-6 in conference play. KU dropped to 11-24-1 overall and 1-11 in the Big Eight.

In the first game Sunday, K-State jumped out to an early lead behind big second and third innings. In the second inning with the bases loaded, K-State's Jeff Hulse was hit by a pitch. This sent Otto Kaifes home, giving the Wildcats a 1-0 lead.

Leo Seiler, who reached base on a walk, scored on a passed ball by Kansas catcher Joe Pfister. Tom Parsons then stepped to the plate and ripped a double into left-center field, scoring Eric Haines and Hulse.

In the third inning, Haines singled to left, scoring Jeff Turtle and Kaifes, who had reached base with singles.

Kansas was held hitless by K-State's starting pitcher Mike Hammacher until the fifth inning, when the Jayhawks tied the score after scoring six runs on four hits and two errors.

The Jayhawks scored two more runs in the sixth inning to go ahead 8-6. The score was tied again, this time by K-State, in the bottom of the sixth when Seiler doubled, scoring Scott Spangenberg and Mike Hinkle.

The Wildcats pulled ahead 9-8 in the seventh inning when Hinkle singled Parsons home. Kansas scored three runs in the eighth to K-State's one, taking an 11-10 lead. The Jayhawks added three more runs in the ninth inning to win 14-10.

The teams combined for 27 hits in the slug-fest. KU pitcher Bret Morris collected the win (1-0). Paul Iseman was credited with the loss (2-3).

Sunday's second game proved to be better for the Wildcats. Mike Hinkle went the distance on the mound in the 6-2 win.

"He threw a heck of a ball game," Clark said. "He's turned into a great pitcher."

Hinkle gave up seven hits in the game and was helped out by a better K-State defense than was exhibited in the first game. The 'Cats commited just two errors in the second game, compared with four in the first.

It was KU's errors instead that proved to be the difference in the game. K-State scored five runs in the second inning on two hits and three Jayhawk errors.

Parsons hit a triple to the warning track in left-center field, driving in Haines and Kent Gleason, giving K-State a 3-1 lead.

Hinkle reached first base on a KU error, and with two outs in the inning, Turtle stepped to the plate. He proceeded to smash his ninth career home run over the left-center field fence, collecting two RBIs and putting K-State ahead 6-1.

KU scored one more run in the sixth inning, but was shut down in the seventh, as Hinkle improved his record to 3-1. KU's Brad Hinkle, 1-1, was credited with the loss.

Turtle "had a great weekend" for K-State, Clark said. He was eight for 16 at the plate, and blasted another home run to win the second game of Saturday's twinbill.

"Turtle's in a great groove," Clark said. "He had a great weekend for us, and he's sure doing a good job."

In the second game Saturday, K-State tallied eight hits in the 6-4 win. Paul Iseman relieved starting pitcher Darryl Rowley and collected the win. Mike McCloud went the distance for KU in the loss.

"(That) second game was well played," Clark said. "Their pitcher (McCloud) was probably the second-best pitcher I've seen this year."

In Saturday's opener, Hinkle was 4-of-5 at the plate and David Chadd hit a three-run home run to spur K-State to the 11-6 win. Zack Kimball, 3-2, was the winning pitcher as Marty Darnell collected his fourth save of the year. Scott Taylor fell to 1-4 in the loss for KU.

Stipulations accompany 'free' travel notices

Editor's Note: This is the first of a five-part series on misleading mail offers.

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

Stuck between the phone bill and a request for a charity contribution, many people have been finding a free vacation notification in their mailbox.

The vacations range from two days and two nights in Daytona, Fla., to a prepaid luxury cruise in the Grand Bahamas.

The offer sounds too good to be true. And it is. Most of these "free" vacations come with a hitch of buying a timeshare resort or joining a travel club, said Marilyn White, operations manager at the Topeka Better Business Bureau.

A timeshare resort is property owned by several people, each of whom uses the resort periodically throughout the year.

Some businesses, from automobile dealers to solar energy companies, even offer vacations for buying products or services, she said.

The catches are very simple, yet the offer does not spell them out. For example, the recipient may have to be a certain age, meet a particular income requirement or travel with a spouse.

Free airfare or accommodations are often offered if a person purchases a second ticket.

"The problem with this requirement," White said, "is that the price of the ticket you have to purchase is at the full fare price, with no discount.

"It is cheaper, in this case, to buy two discounted tickets from a travel agent."

In most cases, when a company or timeshare resort offers a low fare or a free trip, it makes up the money in some other area, she said.

For example, one marketing company offered low airfare to a resort island. The company made the hotel bookings, but failed to mention that the hotel reservations were on a space-available basis. If there was no space left in the specified hotel, the hotel rates were $40 a day higher than normally charged, and the recipient had to stay at least seven nights.

Another travel club sent a postcard to the "lucky winner" chosen to receive a "Fabulous Florida Vacation." The card was accompanied by a long-distance telephone number to call for more information.

The information the curious caller received was that the vacation certificate could only be claimed with the purchase of a membership in the travel club.

The benefits of the travel club included savings of up to 50 percent on hotel chains, airfares and car rentals.

Attorney General Robert Stephan responded to a letter of dismay about this particular company. He said these travel clubs have been a disappointment to most consumers who join them, and most people discover the free vacation isn't really free.

Some certificates for the vacations require a nonrefundable reservation fee, White said. This charge, which can range from $50-$100, is rarely spoken of in the initial solicitation.

Another problem with these vacations is that the reservations must be made one to two months in advance. Unfortunately, Stephan said, travel companies often notify the certificate holder a few days before the scheduled departure that the requested dates are not available.

If the certificate holder's schedule is not flexible, the certificate is void.

Vacation certificate companies and travel clubs were the fourth most inquired about businesses at the Better Business Bureau in 1986, White said.

"Many of the companies that were complained about are currently under investigation by the BBB or have closed down," she said.

Among the complaints made to the BBB were that consumers did not receive the offered vacation certificate, the offer was misrepresented or the eligibility requirements were changed after the consumer agreed to join the club.

The First Travel Club in Chicago claims to be a revolutionary new travel charge card with credit privileges as high as $7,500. It also claims that when one of its members takes a trip, including air travel, the First Travel Club will give the consumer a 5 percent cash rebate.

However, next to this claim are two asterisks. The two corresponding asterisks at the bottom of the page are next to a sentence in very small type, "Due to additional administrative costs, the 5 percent rebate does not apply when you charge your trip on your First International Travel Charge Card."

The BBB in Topeka has received several complaints about the First Travel Club, White said.

"One consumer said the company didn't offer them the convenience or savings that was represented," she said.

After a formal complaint was filed through the BBB, the First Bank Club refunded the disgruntled customer's money.

The Bank Card Travel Club in Chicago is another company that has received complaints.

Roxanne Hawkins, Data Control Technician II, received a letter from the club in November offering her free gifts and a free VIP three-month trial membership. The free gifts were a Ninoka camera and case and a travel bag.

The letter said the company would send Hawkins the free gifts and the verification of her trial membership upon receipt of an enclosed certificate of acceptance. She mailed the certificate.

Last week, Hawkins received her Visa statement with a $49.20 charge from the Bank Travel Club for a year's membership.

"I did not consent to joining the club," she said.

When Hawkins called the company to complain about the charge, she said she was informed that since she did not notify them before the expiration date, she automatically became a member.

"I have all the papers that I've received from them, and they never said anything about an expiration date," Hawkins said.

The free camera arrived in the mail Saturday.

"I'm sending it back," Hawkins said. "I bet it doesn't even work. It is as cheap as can be."

Since the Bank Card Travel Club went into business in November 1982, the Chicago BBB has received 131 complaints about the company, most of them dealing with incorrect billing, White said.

The New York BBB asked the travel club for substantiation of the claim that it has lower prices than any travel agency. The Bank Card Travel Club could not.

Therefore, the New York BBB informs people interested in the travel club that it has an unsatisfactory business performance.

White said consumers should be aware that certificates signed for free gifts and trial memberships give the company access to their Visa card number.

Officer rescues trapped dog

By CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

It wasn't a typical Saturday drive out to Tuttle Creek Reservoir for one Manhattan family after their dog was trapped in a sinkhole for nearly 3½ hours.

Michael Suleiman, professor of political science, had taken his family out to the reservoir to watch the tubes while they were both open. Shortly after they arrived, a 6-foot square sinkhole occurred in the road on the east side of the tubes.

The family dog, Rocky, was running around the area and accidentally fell into the 17-foot deep hole about 2 p.m. when he was scared by several people trying to catch him.

"I had wanted to leave the dog in the car, but my son said 'no,'" Suleiman said. "My son opened the door, and the dog ran out."

Even though Rocky was running around the area of the sinkhole, Suleiman doesn't believe the dog would have fallen in if the people had left him alone.

"When the people around the hole realized the dog was near the hole, they moved toward him to protect him," he added. "By trying to grab the dog, they scared him. He ran away from them and, not realizing where he was going, fell into the hole."

"I was afraid he might have been hurt, but my main fear was that more of (the asphalt) might have fallen in" and further trapped or injured the dog, he said.

"He's become practically part of the family," Suleiman said. "He's 10 years old, which is almost 70 years old in human years."

During the next two hours, park rangers tried unsuccessfully to save the dog by raising him to the surface in a large toolbox and then a basket. They were unable to persuade the dog to climb into either, and rescuers eventually decided to send a person down into the hole to retrieve Rocky.

Sgt. Robert Saber of the Riley County Police Department climbed down a ladder to save the dog.

Texaco

very much in business," DeCrane said.

However, Texaco attorney Harvey Miller said in all likelihood no dividends would be paid to stockholders in the parent company while Texaco is in Chapter 11.

Miller said a settlement could still be reached with Pennzoil while Texaco is in bankruptcy proceedings.

Last week, the U.S. Supreme Court rejected a lower court's ruling freeing Texaco from posting the huge bond, increasing pressure on Texaco to settle with Pennzoil or to file for bankruptcy court protection.

In 1985, a jury in Houston found that Texaco unlawfully interfered with a 1984 merger agreement between Pennzoil and Getty by trying to buy Getty, and it awarded Pennzoil $10.5 billion in damages.

The Texas Court of Appeals in February cut that by $2 billion, but with interest Texaco now owes about $11 billion and is required by Texas law to post a bond in that amount pending its appeal.

In January, U.S. District Judge Charles Brieant, in White Plains, N.Y., agreed with Texaco's claim that posting the bond, then $12 billion, could bankrupt the company, thus denying it its constitutional right to appeal the verdict.

Brieant said Texaco need post only a $1 billion bond, and an appeals court upheld his ruling. But the U.S. Supreme Court on April 6 said Brieant was wrong to have heard the case before it first had been fully aired in the Texas courts.

Texaco responded that it would appeal the Texas bonding law in the Texas courts promptly, and on Friday it filed papers with the Texas Court of Appeals saying it could not afford to post the full security without seeking bankruptcy protection. The court scheduled a hearing for 9 a.m. Monday.

Kerr said Texaco had never made a substantial offer to Pennzoil during the negotiations.

"They talked a lot about making a settlement offer, but the fact is that they have never offered anything substantial or anything close to what we or anybody else would have expected or thought to be appropriate."

Pennzoil made a counter-proposal to Texaco's board that was "well within" the range that financial analysts following the case said Texaco could handle, Kerr said.

"Their response was filing for bankruptcy," he said.

Texaco, the nation's eighth-largest industrial company, was founded in 1902 as the Texas Co. following the discovery of oil the year before at Spindletop, near Beaumont, Texas.

It has 55,000 employees and had after-tax profits in 1986 of $725 million on $32.6 billion in revenues.

protect herself.

"I never used to require a written lease agreement, but (I) had problems with past tenants and had to start using one," said Mary Ann Thomas, 1000 Leavenworth St.

Thomas now requires a one-year written lease agreement and a one-month security deposit. The lease agreement includes rules and regulations similar to those used in apartment complex leases, she said.

CRB literature also informs students that deposits in Kansas cannot exceed one month's rent for an unfurnished unit and 1½ month's rent for a furnished unit.

As a precaution, CRB encourages students to fill out an inventory sheet when moving in. This protects against the possibility of being charged for damages that were caused by previous tenants.

Caroline Peine, assistant dean of students, recommended first-time renters purchase The Tenant's Handbook of Rights and Responsibilities, which informs students of the aspects of landlord/tenant relationships.

Off-campus housing information is available through the Dean of Students office, which offers a listing of apartment complexes and realtors. A current listing of private-home apartments with benefits and rental amounts is also available, Peine said.

"We accept information from small landlords and keep listings of current vacancies," she said. "We will soon be offering information about people looking for roommates and encourage students to use our services."

Peine said roommates are encouraged to have a written contract concerning individual and joint responsibilities among themselves.

"Too many roommates have problems because there is no discussion concerning responsibilities, and having a contract can alleviate such problems," she said.

Tele-Find, 451 E. Poyntz Ave., is the newest local service aiding students in finding apartments.

"We have a computerized system listing of apartments, houses and mobile homes, and the availability dates," said Kay Lively, office manager of Tele-Find.

Students can give a location and an affordable price range for an apartment, and Tele-Find will use the system to locate such an apartment. Landlords pay for listing the available unit, making it possible to offer Tele-Find free to anyone searching for a place to live, Lively said.

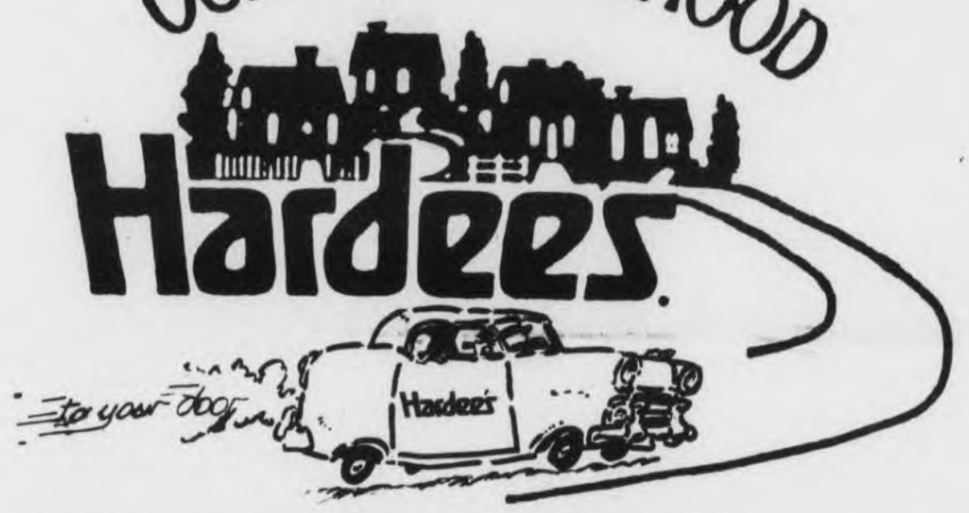
"Unless you write the company to discontinue the membership, you will be billed an annual fee," she said.



Although some states require companies that offer free vacations and lowered rates to file certain information with the state's attorney general, Kansas does not.

White said consumers should read the rules and fine print on any travel offer before responding. Consumers should also contact the Consumer Protection Division of the Kansas Judicial Center or the BBB for the reliability of the company.

"For the most part, I think people should just contact a local travel agency," she said. "They can beat free offers any day — legitimately."

U.S. policy hinders Palestine, speaker says

By JEANNETTE O'CONNELL
Collegian Reporter

The Palestinian point of view is not being heard as often or as widely as it should be in the United States, said Hasan Abdel Rahman, director of the Palestine Information Office in Washington, D.C.

Rahman spoke of the Arab-Israeli conflict before an audience of about 150 Monday evening in the K-State Union Little Theatre.

In addition to serving as director of the Palestine Liberation Organization Information Office in New York in 1974, Rahman was appointed deputy permanent representative of the PLO to the United Nations.

The role of United States policy is obstructive to the Palestinian movement because the public does not know and understand the conflict in the Middle East, Rahman said.

Palestinians are denied certain human rights, he said.

"It is important to make Americans aware of the conflict. (The solutions) may be simple, but not easy (to attain)," Rahman said.

Many think of the conflict as being between the Arabs and the Jews. Rahman said this is a fallacy because there is no hostility toward Jews based on religion.

Rahman said the conflict is between a Zionist movement that advocates the establishment of an exclusive Jewish state in Palestine and the Palestinian people.

Zionism is the effort of the Jews to regain and retain their biblical homeland — Israel.

Rahman said the Zionist ideology came from the historical connection that Israelis have with the land.

"People (in Israel) cannot be ignored the right to live on that land because of an old link to that land," Rahman said.

The conflict's history began in 1947, when the United Nations passed a resolution dividing Palestinian land into two states, one for Israelis and one for Palestinians. Rahman said Israelis have been given their land, but Palestinians are still seeking to receive their land.

"The PLO is an organization of Palestinian people, not a membership organization," Rahman said. "Every Palestinian is a member of the PLO by definition. It represents the framework in which they can describe their Palestinianism."

Rahman said Palestinians in Palestine, or Israel, are denied the same rights of citizenship that Israelis have in the same country.

The PLO still refers to Israel as Palestine, which is a country no longer recognized on current maps.

The Zionist movement of Israel is an oppressive ideology against Palestinians on the basis of religion, Rahman said.

In Israel the criterion for citizenship is religion, not nationality, he said. As a result, a Jew in Chicago who wants citizenship in Israel could have it on the basis of religion. Rahman said on the other hand, Palestinians living in Israel are denied citizenship rights because they are not Jewish.

Because Palestinians do not receive citizenship rights in what they believe is their own country, the 5 million Palestinians worldwide have no citizenship rights anywhere, Rahman said.

"We've been struggling for the achievement of those rights for 40 years," said Rahman, who was born in Palestine in 1944.

He has represented the PLO at the Special Political Committee and at the Security Council in the United Nations along with other conferences.

Union Program Council's Issues and Ideas Committee, Coalition for Human Rights, International Coordinating Council, Arab Students Association, Coalition of Students in Solidarity with Palestine and the departments of history and political science sponsored the speech.

Candidate emphasizes enthusiasm

By The Collegian Staff

Morale is probably the most important consideration in working in a physical plant, said Ronald Blickhahn, the third of four finalists to be interviewed for the position of General Manager of University Physical Facilities.

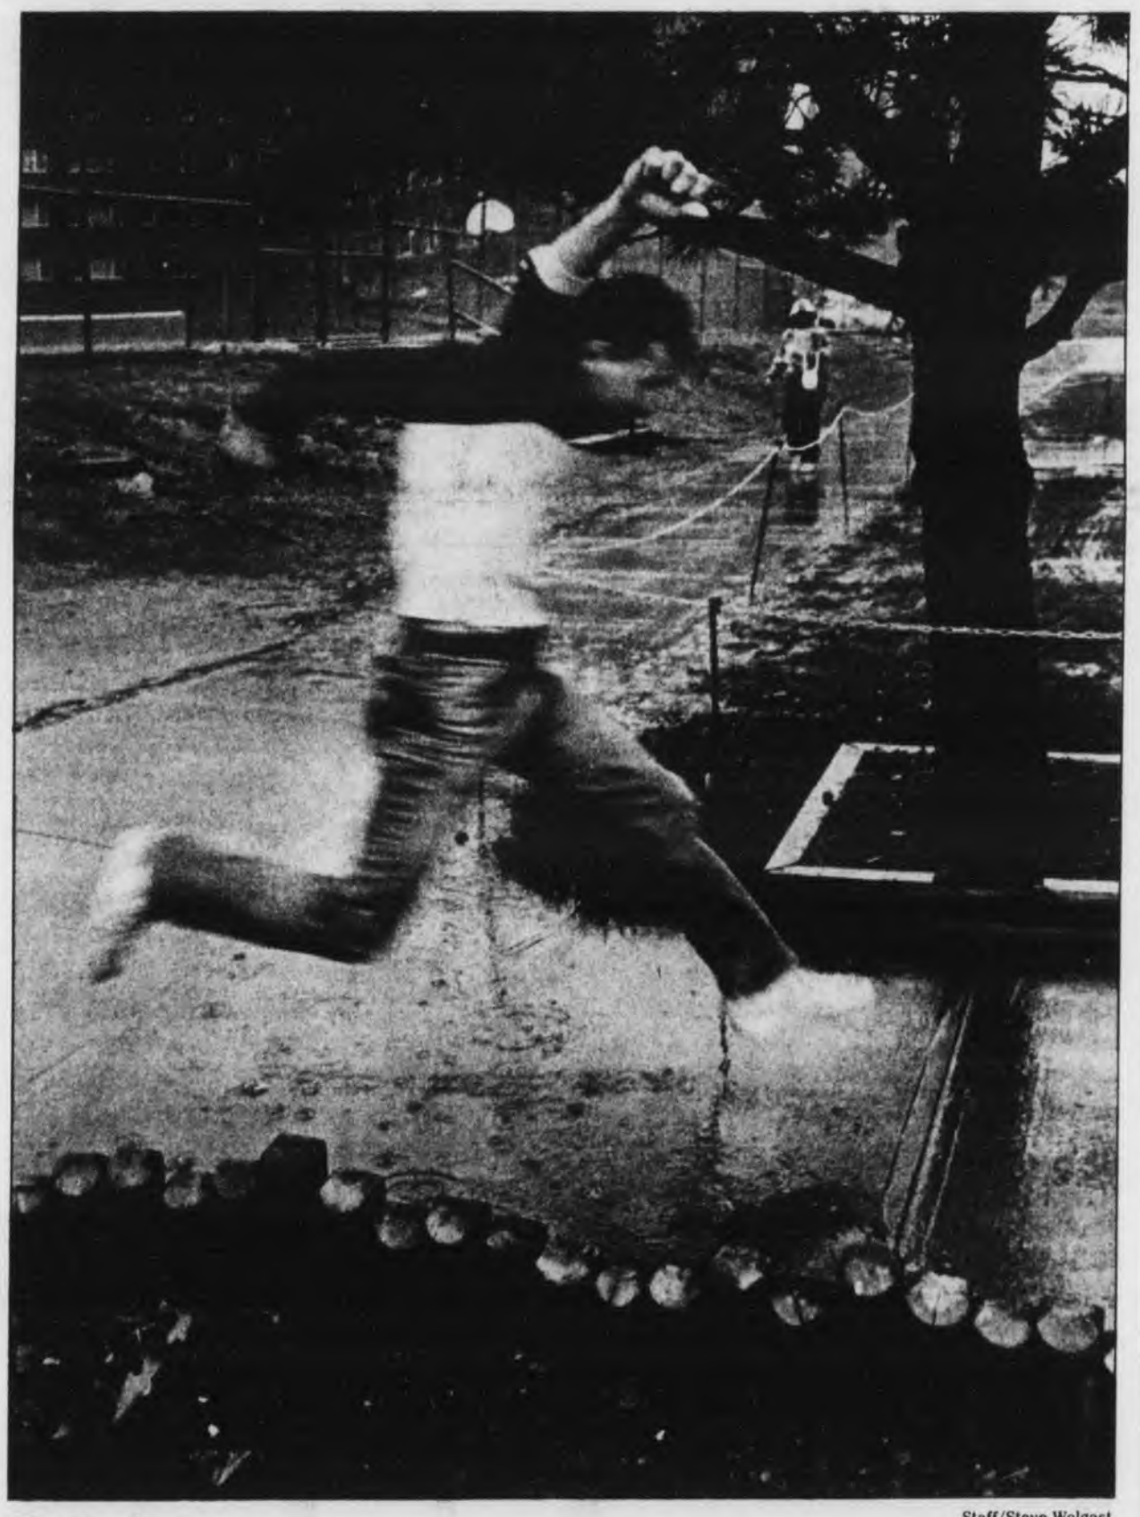
"I believe a positive attitude will dwell upon positive people," he said. "If you look for encouragement in people, they will feel good about coming to work."

Blickhahn, currently the assistant vice president for Facilities Planning and Management at Old Dominion University in Norfolk, Va., was present Monday morning for an open interview session in the Union.

Blickhahn said he likes to build his employees' self-esteem.

"We have just as good of quality people within our own organization," he said. "If we look, we don't have to go outside of the organization to get the job done."

Blickhahn said it is important to meet with the campus community to help them feel he and the University administration will support their ideals.



Before Blickhahn went to Old Dominion, he was assistant executive director of Facilities Management at the University of Wisconsin in Oshkosh.

"While at Wisconsin, we faced a reduction in budget and a declining enrollment," he said. "We had new buildings going up with a reduced budget."

"I believe that these problems (at K-State) will allow an opportunity to be creative with a limited amount of resources," he said.

The final candidate will visit campus Wednesday. Edward Rice, director of the physical plant at Montana State University in Missoula will have an open interview session at 9:45 a.m. in Union 207.

Fred Ferguson, current general manager of Physical Facilities, will retire at the end of May.

Questions continue in student's suicide

Witness' claim defies report

By JUDY GOLDBERG
Staff Writer

Although police records show that just past midnight Friday an officer was dispatched to the street where a student was found dead in his car around noon Saturday, one witness said she did not see a patrol car in the vicinity at that time.

Natalie Darfler, senior in computer science and information systems, said she believes Stephen Lobmeyer, freshman in premedicine, might have lived if police had responded to her call made at 12:05 a.m. Saturday.

Lobmeyer was found dead of apparent suicide from carbon monoxide poisoning in his 1974 Ford Mustang. The ignition was on and police found a garden hose running from the exhaust pipe, under the passenger door and into the interior of the car.

Darfler lives in an apartment complex at 2000 College Heights Road, across the street from where Lobmeyer was found at 1941 College Heights Road.

Darfler said her boyfriend Martin Wesemann, 1986 graduate in mechanical engineering, arrived at her apartment parking his car in front of Lobmeyer's idling car at around 11:45 p.m. Wesemann said Lobmeyer appeared semi-conscious and was moving at that time.

"His head was tilting back and forth, and I thought he was drunk," Wesemann said.

Darfler and Wesemann went outside soon after he arrived to load Wesemann's car for a weekend trip home. Darfler noticed that Lobmeyer looked unconscious and said she called 911 at about midnight to inform them.

"I told the operator I lived at 2000 College Heights and there was a young man passed out in the front seat of his car which was running. She asked me what type of car it was and I said it was an old blue sports car with white stripes." Darfler said the operator told her she would "send someone out."

"I looked out my window two or three times after I called to see if someone had shown up," Darfler said. She and Wesemann left Darfler's apartment at around 12:15 and had not yet seen any police cars.

"When I left my apartment, he (Lobmeyer) had not changed positions, he was tilted back in his seat," Darfler said.

Both said they did not see the garden hose in Lobmeyer's exhaust pipe and thought that he had passed out from alcohol intoxication.

"I just thought he was drunk and passed out," she said.

Riley County Police Department Lt. Scott Campbell, the area director of 911, said an officer responded to the call at around 12:05.

"He checked the area of 2000 College Heights and did not see the car," Campbell said. "He (Lobmeyer) may have moved and come back."

Death puzzles peers, family

Saturday morning, Stephen Lobmeyer, freshman in premedicine, apparently committed suicide, but until he was arrested and charged with a DUI early Friday morning, he showed no signs of a suicidal tendency, according to his former roommate.

"Before that everything seemed normal," said David Adams, freshman in engineering. "He was kind of depressed Friday after he got the DUI.

He said he went home last weekend and did not spend much time with Stephen on Friday. Before he left, Adams said Stephen did not talk about getting the DUI.

"He really didn't say much of anything about it," he said. "He was just kind of quiet.

"He was a great roommate for me; we're all going to miss him."

Stephen's mother, Martha Lobmeyer, said she and her husband talked to him Tuesday after he purchased a 1976 Chevrolet Camaro.

"We had just talked to him Tuesday," she said. "He just seemed like he was on top of the world."

Martha said Stephen was going to Charlie's Neighborhood Bar, 1800 Claflin Road, less and that his grades had improved this semester.

She and her husband advanced Stephen money to purchase the car because his 1974 Ford Mustang was not running well. Adams said Stephen's new Camaro was impounded when he was arrested Friday.

Stephen died in his Mustang of carbon monoxide poisoning, according to Robert Cathey, district coroner. He was found by Riley County Police Department officers, who said the ignition was on and there was a garden hose running from the exhaust pipe to the interior of the car.

Martha said Stephen believed "what he did in college would affect the rest of his life."

When her son was arrested, marijuana was also found in his possession, Martha said. She said Stephen's education was funded largely by the National Guard and he probably thought having the drug-related arrest on his record would result in his being released from the Guard.

Maj. John Mettner, legal adviser for the Kansas National Guard, said Stephen would not have been discharged for possession of marijuana.

"I doubt that would have affected his military career," Mettner said. He said, however, the Guard does not condone drug use.

Stephen probably thought the record would also hurt his chances of getting into medical school, Martha said.

Bettie Dale, Stephen's adviser, said police records are not checked when students apply to medical school.

Columnist to deliver 74th Landon Lecture

By The Collegian Staff

Syndicated political columnist and ABC television news commentator George Will will deliver the 74th Alfred M. Landon Lecture on Public Issues at 10:30 a.m. Wednesday in McCain Auditorium.

Will is an "intelligent and perceptive conservative," said William Richter, head of the Department of Political Science.

Paul Parsons, associate professor in journalism and mass communications, said Will was "the most eloquent spokesman for conservatism in the country today." Although people may disagree with him politically, Parsons said, Will has a brilliant mind and should be a fascinating speaker.

The address is open to the public. His speech topic was not available at press time.

Following his address, Will will be the guest of the Landon patrons at a noon luncheon.

Will, recipient of the 1977 Pulitzer Prize for his commentary, has worked for the Washington Post and Newsweek. He is the author of three books, including "The Morning After: American Successes and Excesses from 1981 to 1986."

The next Landon Lecturer will be Nobel Prize winning economist Franco Modigliani on April 21.

Senate to continue funding allocations

By The Collegian Staff

Student Senate will continue with tentative allocations of about $250,000 in student fees to campus groups at 6 tonight in the Union Big Eight Room.

Campus organizations seeking funding are Legal Services, Student Governing Association, International Coordinating Council and Black Student Union.

Legal Services asked for $26,527.95, an increase of $3,334.95 over its allocation last year. However, Finance Committee recommendation is $1,504.08 less than the group's request. The majority of the reduction comes from the salary of the students' attorney.

One of the largest budgets to be reviewed during the allocation process is that of SGA. The organization requested $33,367.18, but Finance Committee halved the $600 salary request for coordinator of finances, reducing the total recommendation to $33,067.18. SGA received $32,608.50 last year.

ICC is requesting $5,076.95 for the 1987-88 fiscal year, but Finance Committee recommended it receive $880.45 less. Last year the group was allocated $3,620.20.

In addition, BSU requested $1,390 for its share of the financial pie. Last year, the group was allocated $745.70, and Finance Committee is recommending it receive about the same, or $754.40.

Allocations will continue through the end of April.

Tutu, clergymen oppose new limits

CAPE TOWN, South Africa — Archbishop Desmond Tutu and other clergymen urged people at a special prayer service Monday to defy new limits on speech and assembly. The U.S. ambassador was among 700 people in the congregation.

Ambassador Edward Perkins issued a statement saying: "It is sad that a government which claims to uphold the values of human dignity, and which portrays itself as secure and strong, should be so intimidated by the peaceful protestations of its citizens that it declares those protestations to be illegal."

Perkins' attendance and his statement represented one of his most vivid gestures since he became the first black American ambassador to South Africa last November.

The ambassadors of Canada, Sweden and Austria also attended the ecumenical service dedicated to people detained without charge under a nationwide state of emergency the white government imposed 10 months ago.

Regulations issued Saturday by Police Commissioner Johan Coetzee make it a crime to call for release of detainees by word, action or in writing. Gatherings in support of detainees also are banned. Penalties for breaking the rules range up to a fine of 20,000 rand ($10,000) or 10 years in prison.

Stephan denies required consent

TOPEKA — Attorney General Robert Stephan said in an opinion made public Monday that government can't make parental consent mandatory in providing contraceptive services to minors, but reasonable parent involvement can be required.

"It is clear that absolute prohibitions on the availability of contraceptives for minors are unconstitutional," Stephan said. "(But) we believe that restrictions other than a blanket veto by a third party over a minor's decision of whether or not to use contraceptive devices could pass constitutional muster."

The U.S. Supreme Court has held that mandatory parental consent in providing contraceptive devices or services to minors would be unconstitutional, he noted.

Stephan responded to an inquiry from Thomas Burgardt, Finney County counselor, who asked whether the Finney County Health Department could provide family planning services to minors without parental consent.

Plane crashes near Kansas City

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — A cargo plane crashed Monday night as it was preparing to land at Kansas City International Airport on a flight from Wichita, the Federal Aviation Administration said.

The number of people aboard the Boeing 707 was not known, said Ron Cop, regional duty officer for the FAA in Kansas City. He said the usual crew for a cargo flight was three people.

The crash occurred about 10 p.m. just southeast of the airport, Cop said.

News media at the scene reported the wreckage of the plane was on fire in an unpopulated area.

Radio station KCMO said eye witnesses reported seeing a burst of orange flame when the plane crashed in a field. The fire was still burning more than one hour after the crash.

Visibility in the area at the time was reduced to about one-half mile by light fog.

It was the first large plane to crash at the airport since it opened in 1972.

FAA investigates 4 near-collisions

WASHINGTON — The Federal Aviation Administration is investigating four incidents over a 10-hour period in which commercial jetliners came dangerously close to colliding with smaller planes, officials disclosed Monday.

The four near-collisions last Friday involving jetliners from United Airlines, Trans World Airlines, Northwest Airlines and American Airlines are considered an unusually high number, according to aviation safety experts.

The FAA is already under criticism because of an increasing number of such incidents.

During all of last year, the number of reports in which commercial aircraft were reported to have flown within 500 feet of another plane averaged just under one per day, according to FAA statistics.

FAA spokesman Fred Farrar, confirming the Friday incidents, said in two of the cases air traffic controllers had provided the jetliner pilots with advanced traffic advisories and in another case the smaller plane was not on radar.

The incidents, in which two aircraft in each case came within 500 feet of each other, occurred at altitudes ranging from 3,500 feet to 9,000 feet near Chicago, Newark, Saginaw, Mich., and Burbank, Calif.

NBC cancels 'Hill Street Blues'

LOS ANGELES — NBC's "Hill Street Blues," the most honored dramatic series in television history, has answered its last roll call and will join that big precinct in the sky, it was announced Monday.

The offbeat, darkly humorous police show will have its final original telecast on NBC on Tuesday, May 12, with an episode entitled "It Ain't Over 'Til It's Over."

"It was a wonderful seven years, and it's time," said "Hill Street" co-creator Steven Bochco, who was fired as co-executive producer in 1985.

The cancellation of the show, which had been expected for weeks, was announced by Arthur Price, president of MTM Enterprises, which produces the show.

The police show made its debut in January 1981 and nearly sank because of low ratings until it captured eight Emmy awards that September.

"Hill Street Blues" went on to win 26 Emmys from the Academy of Television Arts & Sciences. Only "The Mary Tyler Moore Show" with 29 won more.

AMA president for 'new morality'

DETROIT — The president of the American Medical Association on Monday called for a new morality to combat the spread of AIDS, and he said doctor-patient confidentiality hinders physicians' ability to protect people whose partners may have the deadly disease.

"If people out there are having multiple sexual experiences and going to houses of prostitution, they're playing Russian roulette," said Dr. John J. Coury Jr. "What we're talking about is preventing death."

Coury, at a news conference before addressing the Economic Club of Detroit, said efforts to impose moral standards to prevent the spread of disease had failed because the stakes weren't as high as they are now.

"The difference is, this is 100 percent death," he said. "If this doesn't frighten people into changing their lifestyles, then they are the stupid ones, not us."

Orchestra to honor graduates at concert

By The Collegian Staff

The Kansas State Orchestra will end its performance season with a concert honoring graduate student members at 8 tonight in McCain Auditorium.

Pieces by three graduate students will be featured, said Adrian Bryttan, assistant professor of music and director of the orchestra.

Kimi Manji, graduate in music, will conduct the first piece, "Romanian Rhapsody No. 2."

The second piece, a violin concerto written in the ninth century will be performed by Xiao-Qing Yu, freshman in music.

"Very few violinists attempt to play this piece because of the level of difficulty," Bryttan said.

"This is Yu's first year at K-State. He came here from mainland China where his father is well-known for his musical talents."

The third student featured is Laurel Macadam, graduate in music.

The orchestra will play the "Symphony of Hymns," a composition written by Macadam for her master's thesis project.

"It's really heartening to see how many students like the piece," Macadam said.

The composition incorporates main themes of traditional hymns including "Hark the Herald Angels Sing" and "Christ the Lord Has Risen Today."

"The movements follow the life of Christ," she said.

Macadam described her composition as a modern setting to old hymns. The hymns are recognizable but the harmonization is different, she said.

"The composition is a very accessible piece for the audience," Bryttan said.

Macadam has played flute with the orchestra for the past three years and will graduate in May. She plans to do graduate study in composition at the University of Missouri, Kansas City.

The final concert piece will be "Celebration for Orchestra" by New York composer, Ellen Zwilich, who will be a University Convocation guest lecturer April 22.

No admission will be charged for the orchestra's performance.

'Warm Waves' hit U.S.

Graduates begin greeting card business

By DANA BRADLEY
Collegian Reporter

Two 1984 K-State graduates have originated a brand of greeting cards called "Warm Waves."

Karen Herren, apparel design graduate, and Tim McNamara, graphic design graduate, are a husband-and-wife team who have worked together to produce a successful business.

McNamara said he got the idea of making the greeting cards after receiving an advertising job in the Chicago area. In November 1985, he began circulating his portfolio in hopes of getting into a different type of work.

"I showed my portfolio to some ladies running a card store, and they liked it," he said.

McNamara and Herren began going to card shows to get ideas for their own cards in January 1986. After a year of attending shows and viewing other works they came up with "Warm Waves" greeting cards.

The cards depict various birds and fish. They are exaggerated characters with the purpose of creating a warm, receptive feeling, Herren said.

A spring gift show in Dallas this past January proved successful when they showed their cards for the first time.

"We've been successful since Dallas," McNamara said. "We made a lot of contacts and have talked to sales representatives and companies."

Currently, representatives in 23 states are selling the cards.

The pair is planning to attend the National Stationary Show May 17-20 in New York.

"It usually takes approximately three years to get into a national show," he said. "They called and told us that they had an opening in the national show, so we accepted it."

After attending the show in New York, they are hoping to gain more nationwide recognition. T-shirts with pictures of the animated characters are planned for marketing next spring, Herren said.

"We have other gifts, too, like the stuffed characters such as the fish with bendable fins," she said.

Proposal to affect state autos

By SUSAN STAGGENBORG
Collegian Reporter

A proposal to move state vehicles to a central pool and require users to purchase permits produced heated discussion at a Monday hearing before the Council on Traffic, Parking and Police Operations.

At the open hearing in the Union Big Eight Room, research and extension employees, who frequently use state vehicles, disputed the changes in Traffic and Parking Regulations that would take effect in fall 1988.

"We have a crunch for parking space," said John Lambert, director of the Department of Public Safety and council member.

"The proposal is to take the state vehicles to a central pool," Lambert said. The designated parking lots are D1W and D1E west of Memorial Stadium.

"There are 300-400 state vehicles on campus. They have the prime spaces — deans, faculty and students would like to park there," he said.

The proposal's objective was to resolve the number of requests for reserved stalls by the departments. If the vehicles are necessary for everyday functioning of the department, a permit must be issued.

According to the traffic and parking regulations proposal, the permits will be purchased by the departments. The new rule requires departments to eliminate those vehicles not frequently used. If the parking permits are purchased by the department, they will be paid out of state funds, Lambert said.

"The state does not provide any funds for the University parking facilities," said John Devore, assistant professor of electrical and computer engineering and council member. "None of us should have to pay, but since the state isn't paying, we have to even it out."

"(The public safety department) is a self-paying operation like the Union and Lafene," Lambert said. "The money we generate we have to live with. We do not get any state support.

"We will try to organize a motor pool type area for state vehicles not in use," he said. Departments will determine which state vehicles are used less often.

Walter Woods, dean of the College of Agriculture, challenged the proposal by stating that elimination of parking for state vehicles would have an impact on the total college efficiency.

"There will be a severe stress on the college and the departments to pay, adding inefficiency to an already overburdened staff," Woods said.

"We use the vehicles in the same way as laboratories and equipment," he said. "The vehicles are provided for people to be efficient." Woods added that the vehicles were not meant to take up space, they are used for people to reach their teaching and research sites.

The state vehicles are often parked next to the buildings. Giving up these spaces would be a good start, Lambert said.

Another proposal bringing opposition would require vehicles used by people attending courses or conferences through the Division of Continuing Education to purchase a parking permit.

Laverne Lindsey, assistant provost for continuing education, said only 15 percent of K-State's visitors attend conferences and courses offered by the division. Charging visitors for a parking permit is not the solution to the problem, she said.

"It doesn't solve problems, it just makes them worse," Lindey said.

"Everyone wants parking spaces right around his or her own building. It just is not possible," Lambert said. "It is impossible to satisfy 100 percent."

Other proposals by the council would allow residence hall and Jardine Terrace residents to purchase student or faculty/staff permits. The previous regulation allowed Edwards Hall and Jardine residents to park in general parking lots if they bought a permit.

Miss Ag recruiting program goes coed

By SUSAN STAGGENBORG
Collegian Reporter

Two freshmen will soon begin traveling to county fairs across Kansas to spread the word about programs offered by the College of Agriculture.

Kate Perkins, freshman in animal sciences and industry, and Todd Johnson, freshman in agronomy, were announced March 29 as the first Agriculture College Delegates in a new program formed to update the previous Miss Agriculture program.

Formerly, Miss Agriculture promoted the college and helped in student recruitment. The difference in the two programs is, instead of one female representing the college, a male and female will carry out the duties of recruiters.

The college wanted a change in the Miss Agriculture program, said John Riley, assistant director of resident instruction of agriculture and delegate adviser.

"The Miss Agriculture title tended to stereotype her," Riley said. "Some people related Miss Agriculture to someone not professional."

The new program attracted eight applicants, three men and five women, for the two ACD postions. Six judges met the candidates at an informal tea. An individual interview with the judges tested each contestant's knowledge of agriculture and the University.

The final process of the competition was a five to seven minute speech presented before the judges. The two candidates chosen for the positions were announced at the Agriculture Awards Assembly on March 29.

"I wanted to get involved and represent my college. This is something I wanted to do," Perkins said.

"I'd like to improve the public relations at the University and polish the image of the College of Agriculture as an institute of learning," she said."

Perkins would also like to work with the alumni and keep them informed of the happenings in the college.

"I'd like to get out and meet as many potential students as I can," Johnson said, "I'd also like to talk to department heads and find out the strong points of the department they want emphasized and encourage students to visit the department.

"The greatest contribution as an ACD is recruiting students during county fairs," Johnson said.

Johnson said two freshmen delegates, one male and one female, will appeal to a wider variety of prospective students.

"I've had a very positive experience at K-State," he said.

Johnson is currently an Ag Ambassador — a similiar position to the ACD.

"The Ag Ambassador is a very effective group. They are responsible for giving the College of Agriculture a positive image with prospective students," Riley said. "The ACDs complement that.

"I saw enthusiasm about the college and University, and the enthusiasm to tell others and interact with these people in the candidates," Riley said. "They have the ability to present themselves well."

Financial aid proposal would reduce burden

A new student loan program called ConSern has been proposed by a group of university officials and bankers across the nation. This new program is designed to provide students from middle- or upper-income families with up to $15,000 a year at interest rates currently about 9.5 percent.

Repayments start in 30 days and may be paid up to 12 years, and students can elect to pay only interest while they are in school. A student borrowing $3,000 a year will need to pay $285 in interest for that year. Current student loans are carrying a 10.5 percent interest rate.

The new loans will not carry government subsidies, will be arranged through private financial organizations and will require universities to pay a fee to be part of the program.

To take out a guaranteed student loan or qualify for other financial aid, students from families with incomes above $30,000 must pass a means test. ConSern will make loans available with a minimum of red tape and with no family income test.

Just because a student is from a family with an income of $30,000 or more does not mean that student will be receiving any financial assistance from his or her parents.

The student or a co-signer must also have enough credit to cover the amount of the loans. The executive director of the Consortium of Universities in the Washington, D.C., area said colleges would be able to tailor the loans to their own needs and to sign for loans on students' behalf.

Universities that choose to participate in this new program will provide students who cannot get financial assistance with a possible means of doing so. This program opens new avenues for both the student wanting an education and the university wanting to attract students.

Kansans should watch 'supercollider' closely

Last Wednesday, Kansas officials put our state up as the site for a $4.4 billion atom smasher designed to shed light on the beginnings of the universe.

Lt. Gov. Jack Walker and Rep. Jim Slattery, D-Kan., convinced the House Science and Technology Committee to endorse a U.S.-built "supercollider" to advance American high technology interests and studies in the field of physics. A possible site in Kansas would be south of Topeka in Osage County, Slattery said.

This site, he said, has stable geology, adequate water supply from Pomona Lake and ample electrical power supplies from the Wolf Creek nuclear plant and the coal-fired Jeffrey Energy Center.

The state has budgeted $50,000 for site research and planning; other states are spending millions to recruit the project.

Proposals that pass an initial screening will be reviewed by a panel of experts established by the National Academy of Engineering. A list of best qualified sites will be given to the government by December.

Steve Boyda, a Marysville attorney and proponent of pulling out of the Central Interstate Waste Compact, reminded the Senate Committee on Energy and Natural Resources that before Kansas could even be considered as a site for the atom smasher it would have to meet two congressional requirements.

First, the state must provide a low-level radioactive waste storage facility within the area. Second, Kansas must agree to construct a high-level radioactive waste storage facility also within the region.

It seems by their actions that these representatives of Kansas are ready to commit the state to both low-level and a high-level radioactive waste storage sites without telling or asking Kansas residents about it first.

Kansans will not want the money the atom smasher would bring into the state, if the money as well as the state may eventually glow.

Value of volunteerism evident in 'Olympics'

Each spring students who have been hibernating from the cold come back to life to enjoy warm weather sports and activities.

On April 25, they will have the opportunity to help special people while enjoying the spring sunshine. Special Olympics for mentally retarded people age 8 and older will be held in CiCo park this year, and volunteers are needed.

Participants will perform in relays, races, swimming and other events. Students can help make this day a success by acting as timers, judges and huggers.

Special Olympics offers a chance for mentally retarded people to challenge themselves and participate in events from which they are sometimes shunned in everyday settings.

For one day of outdoor fun, students can help create lifetime memories for some very special people.

Those interested can get more information by attending a meeting at 5:30 p.m. Wednesday in Union 204 or by contacting Karen Pettus, area Special Olympics training director and teacher at Lee School, at 539-3591.

Suicides blacken life's promise

PATTI PAXSON
Collegian Columnist

Across this land of opportunity, teen-agers are not only killing themselves, but are making the act of suicide appear to be THE way to deal with life's traumas. Somewhere along the way, the "system" has failed. Whether the failed system is the family system, the school system or the religious system, there is obviously something terribly wrong.

Teen-agers of the 1980s have given a whole new meaning to dealing with those adolescent crises we all know and hate, both while going through them personally and later on as parents. When I was a teen-ager, the world and I went into a crisis mode at least once a week.

I never could understand why Mom and Dad never would let me wear 50 braids in my hair, silver glitter fingernail polish and fuscia bell-bottom pants to school. At the time, it seemed all they could do was criticize ME — my personhood and all I stood for. After all, I knew what was best for me, not THEM.

And indeed, that was the mode I and almost every teen-ager operates in for a number of years during adolescence. It was US against THEM. As a teen-ager, I cannot begin to count all the times I thought there was no possibility of life getting better.

My parents appeared to be the most oppressive creatures on Earth, caring only about me making good grades, looking decent and being a good, upstanding citizen. All I can say now is thank God for those oppressive creatures who I now proudly recognize as my dear, loving parents.

The whole point of my journeying back to my teen years and describing my particular view of life at that time is to illustrate a very essential point I feel is very possibly not being stressed to today's teens: The passage of time is one of the best cures for the post-pubescent blues. At those seemingly lowest-of-low times, allowing time to pass — even just a few days — can make a difference between wanting to live and not wanting to live.

I would be extremely surprised to find someone who is now in their 20s or older who could honestly say those teen crises are anywhere near as severe now as they seemed then. As for myself, I now cannot imagine threatening to run away from home just because my parents would not let me hang around with a girl at school who clearly spelled nothing but trouble to them, but who I thought was "cool." If it was not for the wiser, better judgment of my parents — which I didn't recognize at the time — I could have often found myself in seriously dangerous situations.

Time. It truly is enlightening to look at life the way it was and to realize how silly it was to get worked up over something that now is so blatantly unimportant. It is indeed the nature of the human animal, but teen-agers suffer more from this human flaw than any other group of people. It is therefore essential to give teen-agers all the inspiration and hope that can possibly be given so they are able to develop strength and perseverance for what almost always is a much brighter future.

It is not so much that the hardships of life stop after the teen years — on the contrary. Life becomes more complicated. It is the strength and wisdom that ONLY comes with learning and the passage of time that is the key to surviving life's low points.

The recent rage of teen-age suicides across the country and Saturday's similar suicide of a K-State freshman are glaring examples of a jammed cog in the big machine of life. Time simply does not pass when a person can no longer see any forward movement in life. With time apparently at a standstill, these teen-agers never get the opportunity to develop the necessary strength and wisdom to survive.

Not all people are blessed with loving, supportive parents. However, that does not mean there is no hope for happiness. This country has an extensive and well-run network of suicide prevention centers, crisis centers and counseling centers, many of which are free.

I am a firm believer that no one has the right to take a life — not even your own. Capital punishment, murder and suicide all fall into the same category in that they all break the supreme law of the land — God's law. Only He has the right to give and the right to take away. It is the entire scheme of things that God has in mind, not the immediate situation or even the near future.

The passage of time brings not only cures for the most blue of blues, but it also brings new light and inspiration to situations gone way out of control. The 18-year-old K-State freshman who took his life last weekend is a great example of this.

It was reported he was extremely depressed about the DUI he received Friday. He probably wanted and needed to talk to someone before he left the dorms to kill himself in the car that soon became his coffin. But it was apparent that the right person or the right moment had not yet come along at that particular time. With the passage of time, maybe one of those persons would have walked in the door....

The blurred vacation continues

KIRK CARAWAY
Collegian Columnist

10 a.m. March 16, St Thomas, U.S. Virgin Islands — After collecting BC at the airport and tranquilizing him with a few shots of rum, we head for what is to be our home for the next week. Wes, our island friend with the broken ankle, made reservations for us at this place called the Beverly Hills Guest House upon learning that his new apartment was not available. His explanation for the mix-up was vague and garbled, partially due to the fact that we had all been drinking for the last 24 hours.

Wes, in his infinite wisdom, picked an "inexpensive" place for us to stay. This place is, by all definitions of the term, a rat hole. Whoever built this place was a bit more drunk than we were at the time. The architecture was early ghetto, with the whole mess painted aqua green. It was a sobering sight, which is the last thing we wanted to be at the time. We must find a liquor store and the beach, in that order.

1 p.m. — Things have been up and down for the last few hours. We finally got checked in and went down to a bar with a wooden lobster on the roof to make a few phone calls. We had a few rum and Cokes and ate some pizza while C2 tried to find a rental car. Our idea was that two people could sleep in the car and save us $50 a night plus give us transportation. But this was not to be, as the rental companies would not rent to anyone under the age of 25 unless they had a credit card. We took a few more doses of rum and headed for the beach.

But there's good news too. While everything else is expensive, rum is only $2 a bottle here. So we pick up a couple of liters of rum, a couple of bottles of Coke and a case of beer and head for the beach. Wes grabs a taxi since walking that far on crutches is very painful. The rest of us arrive a half hour later, after nearly experiencing death while trying to cross the street. They drive on the left side of the road here, which makes crossing streets dangerous for the newcomer.

We are now at a place called the Island Beachcomber, a quiet resort across from the airport. The nice thing about this place is it has a little bar right on the beach. We forgot to get ice, but the bartender is nice and gives us glasses of ice for our drinks. Liquor laws seem to be pretty lax around here, as no one seems to care how old you are or where you drink or any of the other silly regulations they have in the states.

3 p.m. — BC, Pyro, and C2 have decided to go snorkling on the other side of the bay. Too bad, because they are missing all the sights. While they are out looking at fish, I have my first encounter with a topless sunbather. Being from Kansas, I have never been "exposed" to such an activity before. "Oh, we see them all the time," Wes says, as he gets a drink. "In a couple of days, you won't even notice."

But I wasn't worried for myself; it was the others who would have problems. A Swedish girl and her boyfriend are laying out a few yards down the beach. I confidently bet Wes a drink that Pyro and C2 will take one look at Inga, trip over their own feet and fall on top of her. It's a bet I can't lose.

4 p.m. — True to form, Pyro and C2 saw the Swedish girl, ran into each other, and fell in the sand in front of her. Wes argues that he won because they didn't fall on top of her, but he recognizes a true clairvoyant and coughs up.

11 p.m. — We are finally back at the hotel (if you can call it that) to turn in for the night. The excitement is gone and I feel dead tired. Pyro and I got separate rooms, but there is a bathroom down the hall. C2 and BC share a room with a bathroom to themselves. I lay down on my bed, too tired to worry about whatever strange insects or reptiles that may be crawling around my room. Good night.

12:30 a.m. — While reptiles are not enough to keep me awake, people yelling at each other in Spanish are. It seems my wing of the building is directly above a pool hall frequented by Puerto Ricans. I look out my window to see one man chasing another down the street with a broken beer bottle in his hand. With my limited knowledge of Spanish, I was able tell that one of these men was upset about the other one stealing his girlfriend. A whole group of Hispanics was now outside watching the fight, with a few people betting on the outcome.

Suddenly, a tropical rainshower appeared and sent the crowd below scurrying for cover. But this was only partially comforting. What if these people decided to come up here and take out their anger on some tourists from the mainland? I was desperately trying to remember enough Spanish to tell these people that it was President Reagan who screwed up their country and not me. I curse myself for dropping Spanish after only three weeks and proceed to barricade the door with a desk. I sit back and think, "Wow, this is paradise."

'Cat coach knows challenges

Singler offers ideas, lessons to receivers

By BILL LANG
Sports Writer

Bill Singler, wide receiver coach for K-State's football team, knows all about challenges.

While playing for Stanford University, he was challenged for a starting receiving job by current NFL standouts James Lofton of the Green Bay Packers and Tony Hill of the Dallas Cowboys.

"When I played at Stanford in the early '70s (1973-76), Tony was a year behind me and James was two years behind me, so I had the experience factor on them," Singler said. "I was lucky to have those two on the same team. With them on the same team I was forced to play harder and it helped me out."

In his drive to be better, he garnered First Team All-Pacific Eight Conference honors his sophomore year and was named the squad's Most Valuable Sophomore Player. In his senior season, Singler participated in the Blue-Gray All-Star game which annually highlights top senior collegiate prospects.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

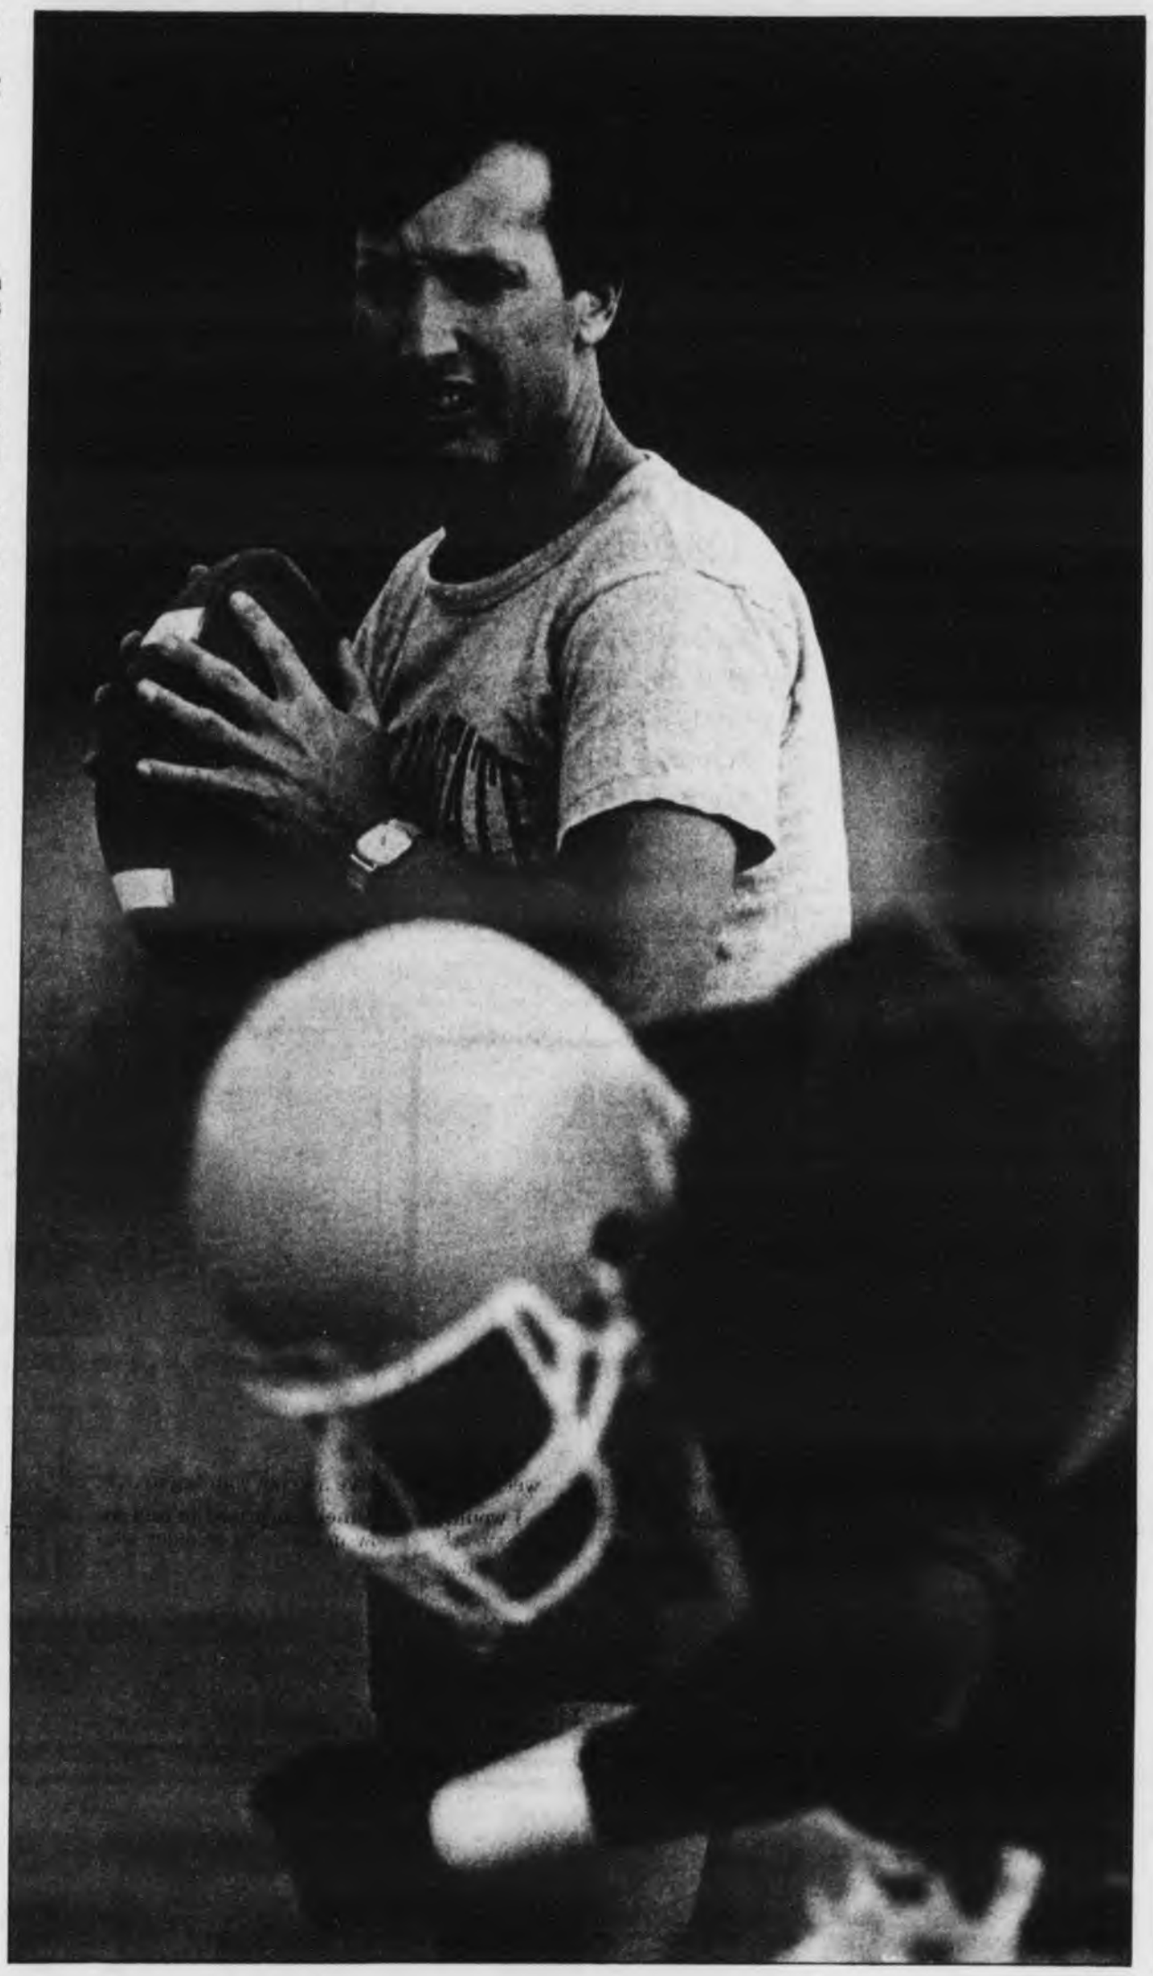
"When I was receiver I had to be very disciplined," Singler said. "I had to learn all phases of the position. I wasn't the fastest but I had the knowledge of the game and the experience. I've taken those ideas and lessons and applied them to my coaching."

During Wildcat practices, Singler issues challenges to every receiver.

"I've got to go out there and make the receiver realize that the position is there for him," Singler said. "He's got to go out and run his routes hard every day. We have to help the quarterback realize what he's going to being seeing on game day."

Although Singler looks for speed and the great hands that makes a great wide receiver, he also searches for the intangibles in the athlete.

"Somebody like junior redshirt Todd Hughes is a prime example," Singler said. "He has the good foot speed and the good hands, but he also has the all-around athletic abilities.



"Also someone like our recruit Gar Ball (from Manhattan)," he added. "He doesn't possess the greatest foot speed, but he has the ability to block, run the good routes and the moves to get open on those routes."

As for the approach he takes with the younger receivers Singler said, "If they come in and show some respect for the veterans then they'll realize they will have to run their routes harder and harder every day.

"The freshmen don't want to be treated any different than any other player," Singler said. "They know they have to go out and pattern themselves after an upperclassman...and be patient."

As for the immediate future of K-State's passing game, Singler was confident it will make an immediate impact.

"Last year was my first experience in the Big Eight (Conference). Right now we have a couple of kids that are hurt (Eric Blades and Todd Cowings), but if we get everybody healthy we can put five or six kids out on the field who can challenge anybody," Singler said.

Wide receiver coach Bill Singler says he must "make the receiver realize that the position is there for him." As a receiver at Stanford University in the early '70s, Singler was named to the All-Pacific Eight team.

Shockers providing 'challenge' to 'Cats; Clark alters lineup

By JENNY CHAULK
Sports Writer

K-State's baseball team, in addition to tackling an intrastate rival, must also contend with a nationally ranked powerhouse at 7 tonight at Frank Myers Field.

The Wichita State University Shockers are set to take on the Wildcats, 17-15 overall and 3-6 in Big Eight Conference play after taking three of four games from the University of Kansas this weekend.

Wichita State, 32-13 and 5-3 in the Missouri Valley Conference, is ranked 21st nationally.

"They're (Wichita State) a good ball club, but I think we're a good ball club too," K-State Coach Mike Clark said. "They've got good pitching and good hitting. It's a challenge I hope we're looking forward to. It would be a feather in our cap to beat them."

This year, the Shockers returned loads of talent from its 1986 team which finished the season 45-18 overall and 12-8 in MVC play.

Seven All-MVC players, including five All-American candidates, have led Wichita State in its attempt to work its way back into NCAA postseason tournament action. The Shockers also return 17 lettermen.

Among Shocker notables to watch for is right fielder Tim Raley. Raley leads Wichita State in hitting with a .373 average. The senior has been a pillar of consistency in his career at WSU while leading the Shockers in hitting his freshman (.384) and junior (.387) years, and finishing second (.386) his sophomore year.

Raley is "as good as any hitter in college baseball," Shocker Coach Gene Stephenson said. Raley has been an All-MVC selection three times, and this year is one of WSU's multiple All-American candidates.

Raley's brother, Dan, is another All-American candidate. The junior third baseman is probably the Shockers best defensive player in the infield. Dan is no slouch at the bat, either. He owns a .305 batting average this season. Last year, he batted .348 and collected 58 RBI while being named second team All-MVC for the second straight year.

In addition to the Raley brothers, WSU has four players who are currently hitting over .300: outfielder/first baseman Rick Olivau, .323; left fielder Mike McDonald, .318; catcher Eric Wedge, .313 and second baseman Mark Standiford, .305. As a team, Wichita State is batting .303

Pitching is also a Shocker strong point, as six pitchers who accounted for 40 of WSU's 45 1986 wins returned this year. Shocker pitchers have a combined earned run average of 4.10 while that of their opponent's is 7.94.

Expected to start tonight against the Wildcats is Shawn Pumphrey. The senior has appeared in six games this year and has record of 1-0. Pumphrey is primarily a spot starter and reliever and has an ERA of 5.75.

"I don't know too much about him (Pumphrey)," Clark said. "I do know he was a highly-recruited player."

Clark said Zack Kimbell will be on the mound for K-State. Kimbell, 3-2, started and won the first game of Saturday's double-header against Kansas.

Clark also said he and his coaching staff were looking at making some lineup changes.

"We've got to stop making mistakes," Clark said. "We've been beating ourselves. Errors and especially walks are killing us; we're still walking too many people. We need to play up to our capabilities and get consistent."

Clark said pitcher Rocky Ferguson may be out for the rest of the season. Ferguson has been out of the Wildcats' rotation due to calcium deposits in his pitching elbow. He pitched to one batter Saturday, but was not able to pitch at all Sunday.

After batting .500 against KU, catcher Jeff Turtle leads the Wildcats in hitting with an average of .404. Mike Hinkle and David Chadd are each batting .388.

Women golfers struggle with cold, wet weather

By The Collegian Staff

One of these days when K-State decides to host a golf tournament, the weather is going to cooperate.

Only one individual managed to break 80 during the first round as women golfers from four teams battled cold, windy and wet conditions in Monday's opening round of the K-State Classic at Rolling Meadows Golf Course in Junction City.

When the Wildcat men held their tournament, April 2-3 at the Manhattan Country Club, the teams were also battered by the wind and the cold which produced above average scores.

K-State's women, after the opening 18 holes of play, are second among a four-team field at the par-72, 5,515-yard Rolling Meadows course.

The Wildcats carded an 18-hole score of 347 to finish 15 strokes behind first round leader Wichita State which recorded a 332.

For K-State, senior Erin Andrew shot an 83 to tie for third individually after the first 18 holes. Senior teammate Paige Harrison stands fifth after an 84.

Wichita State's Brenda Byer fired nine-hole scores of 39-39 for a 78 to grab the individual lead entering today's final round of 18 holes which will get under way at 9 a.m.

Mail-order bargains often 'clearcut rip-offs'

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

Everyone likes to find a bargain and save a little money. But sometimes apparent mail-order bargains turn out to be clearcut rip-offs.

According to a Purdue University consumer affairs workshop study, consumers spent $54 billion on mail-order merchandise in 1984. Five hundred million of that went to fraudulent companies.

Consumers in Topeka and northeast Kansas notified Topeka Better Business Bureau 218 times on mail-order complaints, said Marilyn White, Topeka BBB operations manager.

"Mail-order items were the second most complained about consumer product in 1986, next to cars," she said.

One mail-order item that caused a lot of activity at BBB was an electric piano sold for $12.97.

The item arriving in consumer's mailboxes however, was only 4 inches long by 3 inches wide and ran on batteries, much to the dismay of the consumers.

An identical toy can be purchased at a toy store in Topeka for $3, White said.

Another item causing numerous complaints was a food processor sold for $7.95. The advertisement illustrated a motorized food processor. The item arriving in the mail was a hand-held plastic food chopper.

Although many of the companies advertising one product and selling another are dealt with by the federal government, White said the owners of the companies often change their names and start another fraudulent organization.

The maximum penalty for publishing a fraudulent ad is $10,000 a day for each violation, said Barbara Rosenfeld, deputy director at the Federal Trade Commision in Washington.

Many mail orders are covered by the Federal Trade Commision Mail Order Rule. This rule applies only to delivery problems, however, not what is delivered, Rosenfeld said.

One stipulation in the FTC rule states that all orders must be delivered within 30 days or include some cancelation privilege.

In notifying the consumer about the delay, the company must provide a cost-free means by which to cancel.

The Hosiery Corporation of America is one company that was under investigation by the FTC, Rosenfeld said.

"They (the company) sent unordered stockings to people and then billed them for them," she said.

One rule covered by the FTC is that unordered merchandise sent in the mail should be considered a gift.

"You do not have to pay for it and it is illegal for the company to bill you for it," she said.

Medical quackery is another form of mail-order fraud watched by the federal government. Not only are these miracle diet pills, anti-aging drugs, cancer cures and growth tablets expensive, they can sometimes be dangerous.

Starch blockers, a form of weight control, allegedly block starch digestion in the body. Some ads for these pills claim that people who take them can eat up to 600 calories of starch a day without absorbing the calories into their systems, White said.

Barry Sarvis, pharmacist and owner of Barry's Drug Center, 409 Poyntz Ave., said the starch blocker claim is worded very carefully.

"It sounds like you can take these pills and then eat 600 calories and not gain a pound," he said.

The truth is that the human body doesn't contain certain enzymes to utilize the energy from the pills. The starch tablets have in them 600 calories but they cannot be broken down or utilized by the body, he said.

"This means you are eating a bulk of nothing," he said. "It satisfies the urge to eat but doesn't supply any energy."

Users of the starch blockers have complained to the FDA that the product causes nausea, vomiting, diarrhea and stomach pains, White said.

The starch pills are safer than the popular grapefruit diet pills, however.

Sarvis said the grapefruit diet pills are unsafe for people with high blood pressure, heart disease, diabetes or thyroid disorders.

The U.S. Postal Service, which has jurisdiction over fraudulent marketing promotions connected with the mail, has seized orders going through the mail for a nationally advertised grapefruit pill, White said.

USPS said the manufacturer of the pills violated a consent agreement by making unsubstantiated claims that the consumers would "lose greater amounts of weight."

Other common weight loss promotions include "Burn fat while you sleep," "Erase waistline bulges instantly," and "All the figure toning of 3,000 situps without moving an inch."

All of these programs are subject to question and may pose serious health problems, White said.

"If there were a magic pill that took 20 pounds off while you sleep, there wouldn't be a plump person around," she said.

Some companies promote weight loss through no-work or passive exercising by using their electric muscle stimulators. Although this sounds good, it doesn't work.

Electric muscle stimulators are prescription medical devices used for the treatment of medical conditions such as muscle atrophy.

The Food and Drug Administration sees no evidence that EMS is safe and effective for home use and is therefore misbranded and fraudulent when promoted for weight loss, White said.

do not ask specifically if a student has a police record," she said.

Dale said she and Stephen had a pre-enrollment advisory session Wednesday.

"I had had no indication that he had any suicidal tendency," she said.

Martha said she has had nightmares about her children dying in car wrecks, but "in my wildest nightmares I never would have thought they would ever do something like this."

When their children get in trouble, the Lobmeyers said they always try to help them out.

"We don't see any point in kicking them when they're down," she said.

Many of the residents on Stephen's floor in Marlatt Hall went home for the weekend, Martha said, and he probably did not have anyone to talk to Friday night.

"If he had had the chance to talk with someone, I don't think he would have done this," she said.

Martha said she urges anyone who contemplates suicide to talk to someone about his or her problems. The person "better stop and think what it does to the family," she said.

"Maybe it seems like the end of the world now, but things will get better."

"To my knowledge, the car had not moved," Darfler said. "I don't believe he could have left the scene in the state he was in. I don't think they investigated it."

Darfler said she called 911 Sunday evening after returning to Manhattan.

"I was told that the officer investigating did not find the car because I gave the address 2000 College Heights. The operator said there was a block discrepancy between the address I gave and where he (Lobmeyer) was found Saturday morning. If he would have driven by the address I gave him, he would have seen the car," she said.

Campbell said "it's purely speculation" to assume the officer did not follow through. He said he would review the phone call recording and speak with the officer today.

Horse science students see foal births

By CHRIS HALL
Collegian Reporter

Students enroll in the Horse Science class each spring semester hoping to get the rare opportunity to witness the birth of a foal.

Students in the class taught by Dennis Sigler, assistant professor of animal sciences and industry, are placed in groups of about seven members. Each group is assigned to a mare due to give birth in March or April. The horses are owned by the University and housed at the Horse Teaching and Research Center.

Students begin gathering data on the mare two weeks before she is due. They record her weight, temperature, pulse and respiration at two weeks and one week before the expected foaling date.

As the due date draws closer, the students check on the mare more often, with the idea that they will be able to tell when she is going to give birth and can be present at the foaling.

"I use this project as an opportunity to provide some hands-on experience for the students in Horse Science," Sigler said. "This class has no lab so the mare-foal project is a chance for them to get outside and work with horses. They also gain information about care of the mare before and after foaling."

However, the mares do not always cooperate with the class. Most of the mares foaled early this year or over spring break, and few students were able to witness a birth.

"We stayed out there all Wednesday night. She was supposed to foal on Thursday," said Randy Diver, senior in animal sciences and industry. "But she didn't do anything that night. The next night I was out there until 1 a.m. and then left. She foaled sometime between one and six in the morning."

If a member of the group is present when the mare begins to foal, he or she alerts the other group members. The students watch the birth without interfering and then treat the navel stump with iodine after the umbilical cord breaks.

After the foaling, the students continue gathering data on the mare. They also take measurements of the foal's height and heart girth, recording his weight, temperature, heart and respiration rates. The readings are taken within 24 hours of the birth and at seven, 14, and 21 days postpartum.

"By gathering the information, I noticed the differences in the heart and respiration rates the closer she got to foaling," Diver said.

"After the foal is born, it is amazing how fast he gets up," he said. "Within a few hours, he can keep up with the mare."

At the end of the project, the students turn in their data sheets. They are also required to write a one-page summary about their involvement with the project and the experience they gained from it.

"I stress the gathering of information because if the students really look at the weight gain and the sequence of foaling events, they can learn a lot from it," Sigler said.

"It is a neat project because students who don't come from a farm and have never been around livestock before get exposed to this type of thing," Diver said. "They actually get to work with the mare and newborn foal."

Carlin recalls days in office

By TERESA R. TEMME
Staff Writer

Former Gov. John Carlin said he learned four major lessons from his role as governor of Kansas for eight years.

Carlin told an audience of about 100 at the annual Department of Political Science banquet Tuesday night how to apply the things he learned to educational institutions.

"I can tell you all this, but it doesn't matter if you don't go out and act on it," he said.

Carlin said the first lesson he learned was how competitive the world has become.

"It is truly a very, very competitive time," he said. "You need to understand this as both a university and state and do appropriate studies and analyses to be competitive.

"This applies to each faculty member, class and program," Carlin said. "You need to be competitive and to do this, you must change and adjust. If you keep to the status quo, you are guaranteed to go backward."

The second thing Carlin said he has learned is how internationalized the world is today.

"Whether one is determining curriculums, course outlines, syllabuses, whatever...survival today depends on understanding the entire world."

The change could be witnessed by his own family experiences, Carlin said. He had never traveled outside the United States until he went to China in 1979 as governor. He said his daughter has been to Mexico, and his son has been to Europe twice.

Carlin said the third thing he has gained from his experiences is the knowledge of the direct link between higher education and the future of Kansas.

"Without quality education, the first two (being competitive and having an international outlook as a state) can't happen," Carlin said. "We need to be, as a state, supportive of higher education."

The fourth thing Carlin said he learned as governor was the necessity to form, develop and operate quality partnerships.

"Putting partnerships together successfully is the key to whether things can be competitive and whether they will get done."

Quality partnerships work much better than the old system of just "passing the buck," Carlin said, because eventually it just gets passed to the taxpayer.

Carlin addressed questions on current political issues during a question and answer session.

He said the recent vote on capital punishment "personally made me feel very good." He also added that he understood what the six senators who changed their vote went through because he also had the same experience.

"For the first time in a long time those six senators were faced with reality," Carlin said. He added that capital punishment was only a slim possibility while he was governor, and therefore the legislators did not have to face this issue during that time.

Addressing the issue of losing quality students to other states, Carlin said, "Certainly we export a MOSCOW — Mikhail S. Gorbachev offered Tuesday to eliminate short-range nuclear missiles now in East Germany and Czechoslovakia as part of an arms control agreement with the United States.

The proposal, reported by the Soviet news agency Tass, could remove a major roadblock to a treaty ridding Europe of medium-range rockets.

Gorbachev "expressed the readiness to record an agreement on medium-range missiles (including) the Soviet Union's obligation to eliminate its shorter-range missiles within a relatively short and clearly defined time frame," Tass said.

But the Tass account said Secretary of State George P. Shultz, who met with Gorbachev and other Soviet officials for more than 10 hours, insisted on a U.S. right to match the shorter-range missiles, which have a range of 350 to 600 miles, that would still remain in the Soviet Union.

Gorbachev's proposal seemed to go beyond his previous offer to negotiate the withdrawal — but not the dismantling — of the SS-12 and SS-23 rockets now in the two East European countries.

The Soviet news agency also said Gorbachev was prepared to eliminate battlefield tactical missiles. The two sides have thousands of such weapons, which have a range of up to 350 miles.

"We go further than this was stated in Prague," Tass said, referring to the speech Gorbachev made Friday in the Czechoslovak capital.

Tass also said Gorbachev insisted that U.S. anti-missile or "Star Wars" research be restricted to laboratories and that the two sides draw up a list of the devices that would not be allowed to be tested in space in the course of this research.

In Santa Barbara, deputy White House press secretary Dan Howard said: "I can say that the ideas presented in Tass are interesting and we would take them seriously if true." He said any such proposal must be discussed with NATO allies.

A White House official, speaking on condition of anonymity, said Tuesday afternoon that Shultz had spoken by telephone with President Reagan's national security adviser, Frank Carlucci. He would not comment further.

Senate approves $63,000 in allocations

By MICHAEL MORRIS
Collegian Reporter

After much debate, Student Senate approved tentative allocations totaling about $63,000 of the $247,507 budget for fiscal year 1987-88.

Legal Services was one of four groups being reviewed by Senate allocations Tuesday night. A discrepancy over the group's lawyer salary was the main discussion of the allocation.

Dianne Urban, assistant dean of students, requested a salary of $25,000, an increase of $3,040 from last year's salary. However, the Finance Committee recommended $1,360 less.

Urban said she believes the salary increase was a modest request when compared with salaries of comparable positions at other universities across the country.

After debate Senate decided to reject the increase in salary and approve the total Legal Services tentative allocation of $25,023.87. Urban will be paid $23,640.

In addition, the International Coordinating Council was approved an allocation of $4,196.50 for the upcoming fiscal year.

The group originally requested $5,076.95, but Finance Committee recommended $4,196.50 after reducing the council's advertising and printing expenses, film and equipment rentals, and cost for membership dues.

In other action, the Black Student Union requested $754.40. However, the amount was later increased by $74.

The increase was to pay for expenses of a state car in order for the BSU to meet with other BSU organizations at University of Kansas and University of Colorado.

The Student Governing Association was also up for Senate allocations. The Finance Committee recommended $33,067.18, which was an increase of about $500 from last year's fiscal budget.

However, an amendment was introduced to increase the salary of the Student Senate chair $900, from $2,700 to $3,600.

Senate overturned the proposal to increase the salary, and the tentative SGA allocation passed as proposed by the Finance Committee.

Funding cuts affect drug awareness service

By STACEY NANNINGA
Collegian Reporter

Once again, state budget cuts are causing financial strife at another campus office: Alcohol and Other Drug Education Service.

The future of ADES is uncertain because state and municipal funding grants for the service are not going to be renewed next year.

Bill Arck, director of ADES, said the office is supported by two grants, one from the city of Manhattan and the other from the state of Kansas, under the direction of the Social Rehabilitation Services and the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Services.

Arck said ADES has been operating on these funds for the past nine years. The state grant runs out June 30, while the city grant, which is renewed on a yearly basis, runs through Dec. 31.

The state is taking money originally designated for prevention and education programs at K-State and other universities and distributing it at elementary and middle schools, he said.

The city grant comes from a drinking tax on all alcoholic drinks sold in Manhattan. About 10 cents of every drink bought goes into a fund controlled by the city and used for drug and alcohol education.

Arck said most of this money goes to the alcohol and drug education program at Manhattan High School, while some goes to the University. With alcohol consumption declining in Manhattan and the uncertainty about what the Legislature's policy toward liquor taxation will be, the money in the fund may be drying up, he said.

Arck said the service is seeking alternative sources of funding for next year. Some possbilities are federal monies, additional funding through ADAS and funding from the University.

Federal funding could be provided as the result of new federal guidelines that require institutions receiving federal financial assistance to provide an alcohol and drug prevention program. Although he has not seen the guidelines, Arck said he believes the funds would come from the U.S. Department of Education.

In addition, the Kansas Board of Regents may request funding for this type of program at all state institutions, Arck said. The University may prove to be a key source for funding for the program, as well, he said.

William Sutton, vice president for educational and student services, has been "working very hard on our behalf to see that our office, in one form or another, maintains a presence on campus," Arck said.

Arck said the administration realizes that alcohol and drug prevention services are necessary, and ADES is needed to provide these services.

In Riley County last year, 80-90 University students were arrested for DUI, Arck said, while four K-State students were killed in alcohol-related accidents.

Arck said the main goal of ADES is educating students about drinking and driving. The organization does not take a stance against drinking alcohol, but instead stresses responsible use of alcohol, he said.

"Alcohol is the drug of choice on the K-State campus, and the most abused," he said.

Arck said workers are "leaving no stone unturned" in the search for continued funding to ADES.

Second nuclear accident suspected

BONN, West Germany — West Germany, which was in the path of Chernobyl radiation, said Tuesday it is asking Moscow whether higher radioactivity levels detected in Europe last month were caused by another Soviet nuclear accident.

West Germany, Sweden, Switzerland, Norway and France confirmed Tuesday that varying increases in atmospheric radiation were recorded in March, but reported no damage or injuries. Kremlin officials denied the Soviet Union was the source.

The Soviets were criticized for a delay of nearly three days in reporting the explosion and fire last April at the Chernobyl nuclear power plant in the Ukraine. It killed 31 people and spewed an invisible cloud of radiation over Europe that eventually worked its way around the world.

Officials in Bonn said unusual levels of the radioactive element iodine 131 and four to five times the normal amounts of xenon gas were measured in West Germany between March 9 and March 15.

Environment Ministry spokeswoman Claudia Conrad said the radiation posed no health threat, but the government asked the Soviet Union for further information.

Jury convicts vigilante victim

WICHITA — A man once slated to die at the hands of vigilantes was convicted of voluntary manslaughter Monday in the death of a man police contend was a local drug dealer.

Michael Johnson, 27, of Wichita, faces a maximum of 20 years in prison for his role in the slaying of Earl Ray, who was stabbed and shot twice Jan. 13. Sheriff's deputies found Ray bleeding in a ditch just north of Wichita the next day, and he died six days later.

The Sedgwick County jury chose manslaughter from a list of five potential verdicts ranging from first-degree murder to aiding and abetting Monique Johnson, the defendant's wife and the state's key witness in the trial.

After the shooting, the couple and a relative were tried at a Vassar Street home by a group of vigilantes. Following a chaotic, 10-minute mock trial, the three escaped and surrendered to police.

Five men, including Ray's brother, are set to be tried on kidnapping and related charges in connection with the mock trial.

Monique Johnson, 26, was granted immunity in the slaying in early February in exchange for her testimony.

Johnson testified he was driving when Ray and his wife struggled in the backseat of his car and Ray's gun went off. Monique Johnson contended her husband held the gun while he drove and reached back to shoot Ray twice as the two fought.

Johnson is scheduled to be sentenced May 14.

Board undecided over AIDS stance

TOPEKA — Despite a lengthy discussion, the State Board of Education failed to reach a consensus Tuesday on what approach Kansas schools should take to combat the spread of AIDS and the incidence of teen-age pregnancies.

The 10-member board grappled for more than an hour with eight staff recommendations that call for requiring some form of "comprehensive" sex education program in each of the state's 304 public school districts by September 1988.

Other recommendations say the state should set guidelines for the sexuality courses, encourage districts to provide similar voluntary programs for parents, and require teachers, school administrators and education students to undergo basic sex education training.

Club faces discrimination charges

DENVER — A civil rights complaint alleges that a club linked to the American Water Works Association promoted racism and job discrimination practices at the public utility association's headquarters.

Cynthia Maslanik, a Japanese-American who was employed by AWWA for three years, described the club and its alleged effects on AWWA policies in a job discrimination complaint she filed with the U.S. Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, The Denver Post reported Tuesday.

The club, whose members primarily were traveling salespeople in the water industry, was known as the Road Niggers Association or the Road Negotiators Association, referring to the hard work and time they spent on the road, former RNA members told The Post.

It was managed through the marketing department of the AWWA, where a racist atmosphere prevailed, said Maslanik and Janet Beardsley, another former AWWA employee.

Protests may alter parole location

MARTINEZ, Calif. — A plan to parole a convict who hacked the arms off a 15-year-old rape victim has caused so much anger in Antioch that state prison officials are considering changing the parole location, a state deputy attorney general said Tuesday.

A judge continued until Friday a hearing held on a suit to stop the corrections department from sending Lawrence Singleton to Antioch. Police on Monday had warned angry Antioch residents not to take vigilante action if Singleton was paroled there as planned April 26.

Morris Lenk, a state deputy attorney general, said in court that the Department of Corrections is taking residents' anger into consideration and might change the parole location. Officials have said there is a possibility Singleton could be paroled to a state in the South where he has relatives.

The 59-year-old former merchant seaman picked up Mary Vincent hitchhiking in September 1978 and raped her, cut off both her arms below the elbow with an ax and left her to die on a road near Modesto. He has been in prison since 1979.

New brain surgery creates 'history'

NEW YORK — Brain surgery developed in Mexico to treat Parkinson's disease is a dramatic advance that could lead to new treatments for strokes and Alzheimer's disease, but it requires more study because two of the 11 patients who received it have died, a U.S. doctor said Tuesday.

Abraham Lieberman, chairman of the medical advisory board of the American Parkinson Disease Association and professor of neurology at New York University, went to Mexico last week to examine the patients and said he was enormously encouraged.

"I think I witnessed history," he said at a news conference in his office. "I think this is the approach you're going to take to Alzheimer's, to spinal cord injuries and to strokes."

He predicted that doctors in the United States would rush to adopt the procedure, in which nerve-like cells from one of the patient's own adrenal glands, located above the kidneys, are transplanted into the brain to replace degenerating brain cells.

Less than three weeks have passed since the first report of the surgery appeared in the New England Journal of Medicine, and George Allen at Vanderbilt University Medical Center in Nashville has already performed the operation on one patient there. The patient is in satisfactory condition, and no improvements in her Parkinson's disease have been reported yet.

Professor to examine low-intensity warfare

By The Collegian Staff

A discussion of low-intensity conflict in Central America and the role of Central American refugees in this type of warfare will be the focus of the Lou Douglas Lecture Series on Public Affairs next Tuesday.

Jan Flora, professor of sociology, anthropology and social work and speaker at the pre-lecture forum Tuesday night, said Renny Golden, associate professor of criminal justice at Northeastern Illinois University, will present "Refugees: Linchpin in Low-Intensity Conflict."

"The basic difference between traditional warfare and low-intensity conflict or warfare is that you go after military targets and soldiers of the other side in traditional warfare, and in low-intensity conflict the goal is to destabilize the civilian population," said Doug Benson, associate professor of modern languages and speaker at the pre-lecture forum. "The purpose is to terrorize."

Flora said the cause for insurgency in Central America is twofold.

"The first cause is the degree of inequality of the distribution of wealth within the countries," Flora said. "The second is that you have a small group of people with a lot of political power."

Benson said most of the Central American countries are actually just shadow governments completely controlled by the country's military.

"There are a very small number of people at the top and large number of poor people working for them," he said.

Much of the refugee problem is caused by struggling between powerful landholders to secure more land, Benson said. The people that work the land are then displaced and squeezed out of their existing territory.

4-H exchange

K-Staters to study overseas

By KRISTI BARANCIK
Collegian Reporter

Just as campus life can expose American students to international students and their cultures, other programs allow students to travel abroad and experience cultural and social differences.

Three K-State students have been selected to participate in the International 4-H Youth Exchange program, giving them an opportunity to travel abroad for six months.

The students participating in the program will be Shawn Pine, senior in marketing; Bart Johnson, senior in restaurant management; and Jilinda New, senior in apparel and textile marketing.

"IFYE is unique because you get to live with families for an extended period of time. You learn the culture by living it," said Lois Redman, extension specialist for 4-H Club youth programs and coordinator of Kansas 4-H international programs.

"I think this is a good opportunity to really get to know a country," said Pine, who will be traveling to Australia. "Instead of just being a tourist, I'll get to know the culture."

"Australia is a very up-and-coming country, and one I'm very excited about visiting," Pine said. "I also think I am going to gain a greater appreciation for the United States.

"I'm most excited about actually getting to live their lives, and not just being a tourist and seeing all of the tourist attractions," she said. "I think through learning more about other people's lifestyles, I'm going to learn more about myself."

Johnson will leave in June for Barbados, an island 14 miles wide and 26 miles long, with a population of about 280,000 people. The temperature averages about 70 degrees.

"It's a summer resort for Venezuelans, and a winter resort for Americans," he said. "I expect to have a lot of time enjoying the weather, and enjoying a more peaceful way of life."

"This is also an international experience toward my career goal," said Johnson, who hopes to be a food director in an American embassy.

"It's going to be too easy living there in one sense," Johnson said. "I was really wanting someplace that wasn't English-speaking."

New will travel to Paraguay — a partner country to Kansas through the National Association of the Partners of America. About 30 states in the United States have partnerships with foreign countries.

"The purpose of the program is for America to help Central and South America in a people-to-people program, not through the government," Redman said. "We are helping with special projects, and we are involved in an exchange with students and young professionals."

The Kansas-Paraguay Partners group has sent dentists, wheat specialists, ambulances, agricultural research material and other services to Paraguay, she said.

Because both countries are completely surrounded by land with similar climates, Kansas and Paraguay have similar agricultural production needs, Redman said. Each year, two students come to Kansas from Paraguay, and the IFYE program encourages at least one Kansas student to visit Paraguay.

"It sounds like an adventure and something unique to do," New said. "It's a cultural exchange. We learn a culture by living it, and we try to create an understanding between the two countries."

Almost all of the students accepted into the IFYE program are former 4-H members. They are 19-25 years old and have some knowledge of the farm, Redman said.

Marsha Setzkorn, a December K-State graduate, was also accepted into the IFYE program. She leaves for the United Kingdom this month.

The students have had three weekend orientation sessions. They are learning about 4-H, Kansas agriculture, immunizations, culture shock, passports and packing.

"I think they are doing a pretty good job (with the orientation)," Johnson said.

One aspect of the orientation is to alleviate the insecurity of living abroad, but Pine said she is not concerned.

"I'm not as scared about going over there," Pine said. "I'm more worried about the culture shock of coming back to the United States."

"You can't come back the same person," Redman said. "You see things in a different light. The adjustment coming back is sometimes tougher."

Both Pine's father and New's father were involved in the IFYE program. New's father traveled to Turkey, and Pine's father went to India.

"I'd heard my dad talk about it, and he really regards the program as a good experience," Pine said.

"The program is financed and sponsored through 4-H, but it's a public relations gesture by the United States and other countries," Pine said.

The National 4-H Council provides about half of the money. The Kansas Foundation provides an $800 scholarship to each student, while local 4-H organizations provide another $800 to $1,000, Redman said.

Hinckley, Bundy correspond; letters show obsessive traits

By The Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Triple murderer Theodore Bundy told Secret Service agents that he received three or four letters from presidential assailant John W. Hinckley Jr. during an exchange of correspondence last year, prosecutors said Tuesday.

Assistant U.S. Attorney Roger Adelman said in court that Bundy, awaiting execution in Florida for three 1978 killings, told the Secret Service that Hinckley began writing him in May 1986.

"The Bundy letters...certainly bear some similarities" with Hinckley's previous obsessive writings about the movie "Taxi Driver," Adelman told U.S. District Judge Barrington D. Parker.

Prosecutors and psychiatrists say Hinckley shot President Reagan in 1981 to impress actress Jodie Foster, who played a prostitute in the film.

Bundy "claimed that in 1986, he received three or four letters from Mr. Hinckley," Adelman said.

The correspondence "was initiated by Mr. Hinckley in May 1986; Mr. Bundy stopped writing last October 1986," he said.

Bundy told the Secret Service he threw out the letters he received from Hinckley, Adelman said.

The judge convened the emergency hearing after Hinckley's lawyers complained that Secret Service agents served their client with an unauthorized subpoena earlier in the day.

Federal prosecutors, who Monday night obtained two letters Hinckley received from Bundy, are seeking more evidence of correspondence with the Florida death row inmate, who is linked to 36 other murders.

During a hearing Monday, a psychiatrist unexpectedly revealed that Hinckley had written Bundy, had sought the address of mass killer Charles Manson and had received a letter from Manson follower Lynette ("Squeaky") Fromme, imprisoned for trying to kill President Ford in 1975.

The government is seeking the letters to document its opposition to Hinckley's bid to make an unescorted family visit from St. Elizabeths Hospital, where he was sent for shooting Reagan in 1981.

Hinckley was acquitted by reason of insanity in the March 30, 1981, shooting of Reagan, Presidential Press Secretary James S. Brady, a Secret Service agent and a police officer.

Will's political views bad for America

How does one go about writing a column to commemorate a visit from an author, syndicated columnist, television commentator, ideologue and Reagan-administration apologist George F. Will? It seems there is not one aspect of Will's public life which is not deserving of comment. However, as a suitable starting point, perhaps we should turn to the overriding motif of Will's writings — conservatism. But first, a necessary distinction is in order.

Often when we speak of conservatives or the right, we tend to portray it as a unified movement. In fact, it is a coalition of varied people and interests — everything from Zionist Jews bent on destroying the Palestinian people to neo-Nazis bent on destroying Jews; everything from fundamentalist Christians frightened by the secularization of society to capitalist entrepreneurs, themselves largely responsible for that secularization.

With that said, what I hope to do in this column is discern to what degree George Will is a spokesman of what is usually called the right. Insofar as Will is a conservative, it should be pointed out that he favors not a continuation of present society, but a return to the late 18th century conservatism of British statesman Edmund Burke. In his book "Statecraft as Soulcraft," Will proclaims himself a "Tory" — seemingly unbothered by the imperialist implications of the label.

In this respect, Will clearly aligns himself with the so-called religious right, in that he desires to restore "virtue" (virtue is a crucial concept for Will) to society by making it the primary concern of government. Given Will's distrust of all things secular, a state-imposed "virtue" implies something of a theocracy — perhaps like Israel or even the Puritan settlements of colonial America. The Constitution, of course, must be scrapped to usher in Will's utopia.

If all this seems slightly authoritarian, it probably should. To quote Will, "The truly conservative critique of contemporary

SCOTT MILLER
Collegian Columnist

American society is that there is too much freedom...."

"This," Will explains, "is conservatism rightly understood." He adds that freedom is abused by abortionists, pornographers, businessmen trading with the Soviets and young males exempt from a draft, "to cite just four examples." One is almost afraid to ask what other examples might be.

But this distrust of freedom obviously alienates Will from the corporate executives of the right — concerned as they are with protecting the rights of the individual. Of course, the individual's "rights" usually imply the entrepreneur's right to amass wealth while throwing laborers out of work, but this is, nonetheless, a "right," and therefore a pejorative for Will.

But if Will alienates the right's libertarian conservatives (a term he equates with "promiscuous celibates"), there is another aspect of capitalism which he is wholly prepared to defend — the military industrial complex. He writes, "Men as different as Thomas Jefferson and Andrew Jackson shared a hostility toward military academies, which they feared would be nurseries of a dangerously militaristic elite.

"My limited exposure to first-year cadets convinced me that Jefferson and Jackson can rest easy."

This is a rather telling passage. Not only is Will's exposure "limited" (which apparently does not discourage him from commenting anyway), but he overlooks that first-year cadets rarely have anything to do with formulating national security policy.

While Will recognizes the seemingly contradictory elements of capitalism vis-a-vis his brand of religion-oriented conservatism, he refuses to acknowledge the antagonistic role capitalism has with society at large. Of American conservatives he writes: "They celebrate the virtues of capitalism, which produces such remarkable, relentless social change." (It is this change or secularization that dismays Will as much as it would any Falwellite.)

"Furthermore, their attachment to laissez-faire makes them deeply ambivalent about government and reluctant to use it as an instrument of conservative values, tempering and directing social dynamism."

This might come as quite a surprise to people of the Third World who have suffered the effects of the U.S. military's attempts to introduce laissez-faire and "conservative values" into their societies.

But an equally important consideration for Will, who acknowledges the "social dynamism" of capitalism, ought to be whether capitalism is all that dynamic. In light of the estimated 12 million children and eight million adults in America suffering from a chronic lack of nutrients required for growth and good health (the medical definition of hunger), Will might explain how contemporary society is significantly different from the 18th century of which he is so fond.

Although part of the malnutrition in the United States is due to people dining on Twinkies and Coke, since the Reagan administration's serious domestic cutbacks of 1981 and '82, an increasing number of people are simply unable to obtain enough to eat. However, Will and the right en masse continue to support unprecedented increases in defense spending while ignoring that this leaves fewer dollars for domestic programs.

Yet, Will asserts, "Those at the bottom have the most to gain from economic dynamism." This is perhaps the most salient and unifying feature of the right — its callous disregard for lower-income and working-class people. Will's own political philosophy is certainly no less elitist: "Democracy is a political, not a social concept. It pertains to constitutional arrangements, to the source of sovereignty, but not to a 'lifestyle' or a classless society."

For Will, democracy may presuppose an egalitarian regime, but it most certainly does not presuppose an egalitarian society. He also writes that "for the governing class, the supreme power and pleasure is to allocate hope." Indeed, the rest of us can only hope the interests Will serves will not continue to increase their influence on American society.

The following K-State colleges, cited as examples of the notable aspects of University education, were inadvertently omitted from Mark Buyle's guest column "Debating mediocrity: Education a hallmark of K-State" in Monday's Collegian: the College of Architecture and Design, the College of Engineering and the College of Human Ecology.

Boy's bout with AIDS has lessons for us all

It's been more than a week since more than 600 friends said their final goodbye to Cameron Beach, a boy who died of complications due to AIDS.

What is remarkable is not his death but the way his friends gathered around in support of this young boy during his affliction.

Although parents in the community wanted Cameron to remain away from school, Cameron's friends wanted him to stay and continue classes with them for as long as he could.

What Cameron's friends did should be a reminder to all of us that human lives are valuable in and of themselves — that every human life is priceless and to lock away victims of diseases we cannot currently cure is beneath us.

It seems that Cameron's friends were better acquainted with good ol' fashioned compassion than were several adults of the community, and they had enough common sense to realize AIDS is not a casually communicable disease.

This is not the only example of a continuing senseless fear of AIDS carriers, but it is one where tolerance and compassion was the prevailing behavior instead of hate, fear and harassment.

According to University policy, a faculty member who came down with AIDS could remain and teach for as long as he or she was able. A student can remain in classes. But without emotional support it would be extremely difficult for these individuals to continue.

What it comes down to is the policy is in place but it is up to us to make it work right.

If Cameron had gone to school at K-State, would he have been treated as well and with as much loving kindness?

Customers to be stuck with cable TV tax bill

It's another case of passing it on to the customer.

And, as usual, the customers probably didn't realize what was going on. Last week the Manhattan City Commission approved the first reading of a request for a contract renewal for Manhattan Cable TV Services Inc. In a lengthy presentation, a spokesman for the company told commissioners of a $2.2 million proposal that includes an intensive replacement and improvement of the service.

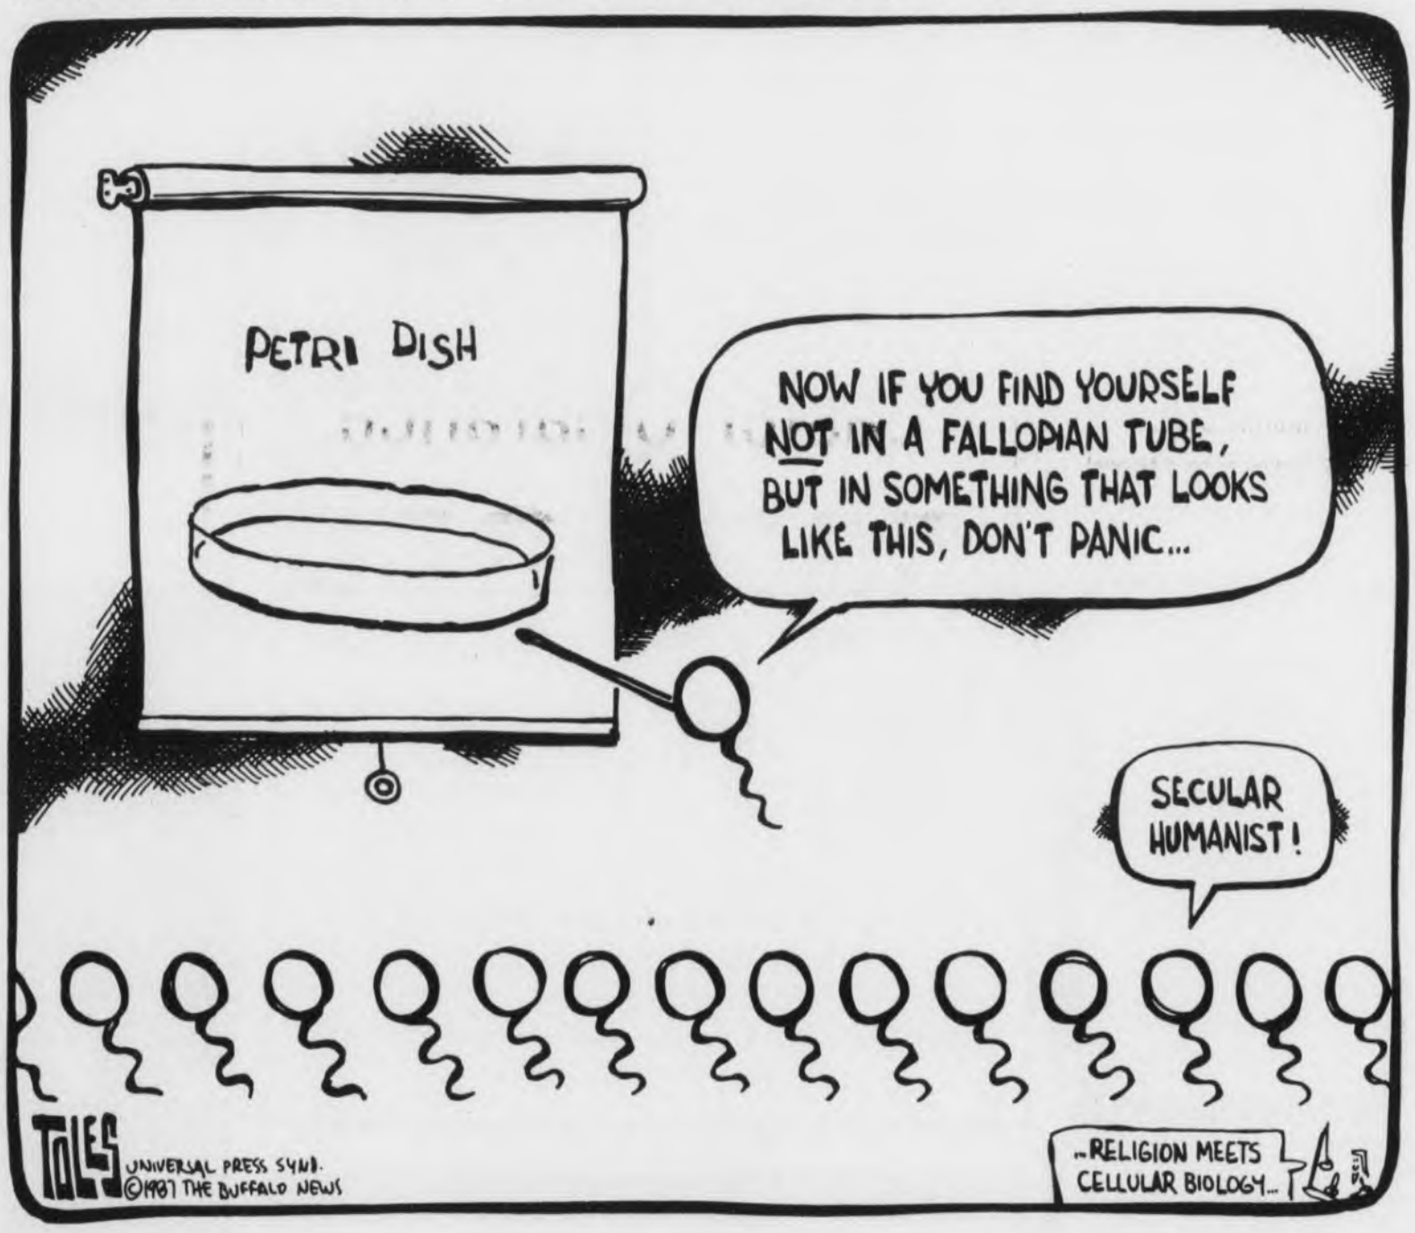
The plan also includes an increase in the number of channels available and, ultimately, an increase in the cost for the service. Currently, subscribers pay $11.55 per month for the basic 12-channel service and $16.05 per month for an expanded 17-channel service.

The new service will include the 17 channels and add seven more for a cost of $14.50 per month.

In short, basic-service customers will see a $2.95, or 25 percent, increase in their monthly bill — a "minimal" increase, a Manhattan Cable TV spokesman said. The expanded-service subscribers will see a $1.55 decrease in their monthly bill.

Many customers, especially those who spend hours in front of the tube each day, will probably agree that the addtional $36 a year is worth the extra 12 channels they will be receiving. And, of course, none of those currently paying for the expanded service will complain — they'll be getting more for less.

But none of the customers come out ahead in the second part of the issue. At the same time they approved the franchise renewal, commissioners also passed an increase of the city franchise tax for cable subscribers from 3 percent of the cable service's gross receipts in a 6-month period to 5 percent of the gross receipts.



While the franchise tax goes into the city's general fund, the 2 percent increase will go to the subscribers as an item on their monthly bill. Basically, the cable service will get its contract renewal, the city will get its tax increase and we, the customers, will get the bill.

Challenge to grow

Editor,

These are hard times in Kansas. And these are hard times at Kansas State University. Each of us is now involved in the destiny of our institution. This destiny is now being planned at K-State under the direction of the Board of Regents.

We are being asked to identify and support strong programs within each college, the colleges are being rated, and universities themselves are being ranked. In many ways K-State is the best in Kansas and ranks with the best in the world. Kansans deserve to be both proud and protective of this hard-won excellence.

Part of this excellence is rooted in both the breadth and depth of our foundations. Let us not forget the importance of a well-balanced scope of expertise here at K-State. Many have worked hard and long and effectively to establish a breadth and balance which puts K-State in the rank of the nation's major universities. We are respected in the arts and social sciences, as well as in our traditional strengths of agriculture, science and engineering. It is this breadth that qualifies us to call ourselves a university rather than just an agricultural and engineering institute of technology.

Unfortunately, in my view, the director of the Board of Regents is pointing us strongly toward specialization. We are being encouraged in this hard time to select particular areas of emphasis without sufficient regard in my opinion to the accomplishments of those, especially in the humanities, who started with relatively little and have given us programs of growing excellence and recognition. In the long run, it is not often wise to rob the poor to pay the rich.

We face a challenge, in the middle of our present adversity, to be the best we can be. In my opinion, Kansas will grow past her traditional narrow boundaries of agriculture and build upon the strength of this proud past toward a broader future. Our land-grant institution is in a unique position to provide that leadership by developing the breadth of support, even in these hard times, that we require.

Union smoke

Editor,

On Gov. Hayden's desk is a bill which was passed by the Kansas Legislature. This bill prohibits smoking in public restaurants, retail stores and public buildings unless it is posted otherwise. Although this law may pass, many places will continue to furnish sections for people to smoke.

If you have ever walked through the K-State Union cafeteria you might have noticed the dingy, smoky cloud that hovers over the room. It is humiliating as well as not too appetizing. In other words, we have an eating place for more than 17,000 students that is filled with cigarette smoke.

Located in the cafeteria are several nonsmoking sections. However, to get to a nonsmoking section in the cafeteria, one must walk though at least one smoking section. Also, if one just wanted to walk in the cafeteria, he would have to walk through the smoking section. The smoke from this area in the Union does not just stay in one area. It filters through the entire Union and hits everyone who comes through.

The Student Governing Board has the authority to designate all areas for public smoking in the Union. Even if Kansas bans public smoking, the wording of the law will permit exceptions. Should we continue to breathe hazardous smoke while we are eating in the cafeteria? Or can something be done to prevent it? It is up to us students to let the Student Governing Board know how we feel.

Proud heritage

Editor,

I was impressed this morning (April 6) with the column written by Patrick Muir. It is indeed his perception (and former President Jim McCain's) that there are islands of greatness at Kansas State, and that is what should be illustrated to our public.

We have some facilities, some faculty and some students that are second to none! What the public hears is that we have no library, we can't afford to buy books and that our best faculty left for higher-paying positions. It is no wonder that our image has slipped over the past 10 years.

Let's stop being apologetic and start being upbeat positive. Our students are the biggest asset and the Collegian is their voice. Let's dig out those "islands of greatness" and let the public know about them.

Being a land-grant institution is a proud heritage! If we have to look down on the silo-tech image, then please explain away the University of Illinois, Purdue and Penn State.

Illiterate students

Editor,

Re: the editorial "Re-educating illiterate grads won't be simple" in the April 1 Collegian. What happens when this is applied to higher education?

Today, I am evaluating essay papers of upper-division and graduate students. Most are in the College of Education, but some are in the College of Arts and Sciences and some in the College of Human Ecology. More than half the papers have grammar and construction errors.

Most students state few professors ever require them to write, and if they are required to write, the errors are not recorded. Granted, public school graduates should read and write if they have the ability to learn these skills.

What is more disturbing to me is the fact students graduate with degrees, even graduate degrees, and have not learned to write. To be honest, the editorial ends a sentence with a preposition, which is incorrect.

Public schools have their problems, but why do we not start at home and stress the importance of both reading and writing at K-State? Just some "food for thought."

Bloody harvest

Editor,

The people of the United States and the world have had six years in which to judge the foreign policy of the Reagan administration. For six years we have allowed President Reagan and company to direct the foreign affairs of the United States. For six years we have waited on results, waited on the fruits of the "constructive engagement" policy with South Africa, or of the "freedom fighters" in Nicaragua, to ripen.

The harvest? Thousands of people in both regions killed and billions of dollars in military and economic assistance pumped into supporting or establishing United States-approved regimes. However, the resistance of the indigenous people to those regimes has only grown.

But there is hope. The true nature of Reagan has been exposed by the Iranaround affair. Across the nation, people are raising their voices in favor of foreign policies that support the people of Central America and South Africa, not just the governments the United States finds acceptable.

A massive demonstration, the Mobilization for Justice and Peace in Central America and Southern Africa, will take place in Washington, D.C., on April 25. More than 800 busloads of people from across the nation will converge on the nation's capitol to voice their concerns and listen to the ideas of others on these issues.

More buses are being reserved, including one that will leave from Lawrence April 24 and return from Washington April 26. Concerned members of the Manhattan Alliance on Central America and Students in Solidarity with Central America will be attending this rally.

Other people who want to become involved may contact Ellen Baker at 539-5189. Six years of waiting is long enough. The time for action is now!

Fictitious union

Editor,

On April 1, an advertisement was published in the Collegian about a lecture sponsored by a so-called Islamic Union of Iraqi Students. Such a union is fictitious because there has never been any union registered under that name in the Student Government Association. To the best of my knowledge, all Iraqi students on the K-State campus have their cultural and social activities under a registered organization called the National Union of Iraqi Students and Youth and other legal organizations.

After inquiring about the nature of that ambiguous group sponsoring that lecture, it appeared that it was actually the Iranian Muslem Student Organization hiding cowardly and unlawfully behind an unexisting union to mislead readers that Iraqi students are against their people, government and leadership.

The illegitimacy of the Iranian Muslem Student Organizations's attempt resulted in the cancellation of both room reservations in the K-State Union and a second appearance of its advertisement, which was supposed to be published April 3. However, pro-Khomeini people, who are always loaded with lies, got back the room reservations by claiming that the lecture's sponsoring group is a "committee" under its organization!

I found it hard to understand why the K-State Union director had changed his mind about canceling the rooms by believing such an obvious falsehood. Pro-Khomeini Iranians speaking on behalf of Iraqis are comparable to Soviet communists speaking on behalf of the American people.

The Iranian Muslem Student Organization may have gotten away with its evil attempt this time by its traditional lying, but I would like to remind them about an old saying: You can fool some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time, but you can't fool all of the people all of the time.

Going overboard

Editor,

Granted, the April 3 Collegian did provide some interesting reading, but it also served to alert one to the presence of people for whom perspective is a forgotten issue and any excuse will suffice to cause these people to go completely overboard.

Item: Dave Kingsley, program planner in race desegregation in the College of Education, after seeing a Confederate flag hanging in a dorm window is driven to such a froth that he equates the "old Confederacy" of the Southern states with "the old Third Reich." Excuse me??

In chemistry, reasoning like that usually evokes the opinion that you've been standing too close to the solvent bucket. C'mon Dave, many societies and civilizations engaged in slavery (indeed were economically sustained by it.)

This does not excuse the gross injustices committed by this practice, but it is still permissible to admire some of the features of these civilizations (Roman forms of government, Greek philosophy, etc.) without being accused of contributing to a holocaust.

Item: In the article "Speaker notes harassment by pro-lifers," a representative from an Overland Park abortion clinic apprises readers of the incredible problems at her place of employment. Do you realize that those despicable anti-abortionists "plan to picket at least once a year?"

How does the clinic bear up under such relentless attacks? In addition, these marauders even resorted to such treachery as sending out bogus baby shower invitations to employees when the speaker was pregnant. What next, bogus Tupperware parties? There ought to be a law against such evil deeds as these.

In summary, both articles may have had important points to make, but they were so ludicrous that they degenerated to caricatures of reasoning.

Sexist comic strips

Editor,

The people on this campus are working hard for women's rights. We have a good women's studies program, a women's resource center, guidelines for non-sexist language and excellent guest lecturers such as Evalina Kane. Yet, sexism can still be found in one of the most read sections of the Collegian, the comics.

If you happen to save Collegians, or know someone who does, glance through some back issues at the female characters in the comic strips. You may notice Lola Granola of Bloom County fame, Bertha and the veterinarian in Garfield and the "college coed" of Life and Times.

Now, look again and consider some of the following questions: How often are female characters featured in relation to male characters? How are the female characters drawn? Is there a trend? How about dialogue? With what frequency are female sayings non-stereotypical statements? How often do you see the female characters portrayed in non-stereotypical roles?

Whether in comics, on television or in cartoons, male characters are afforded greater diversity than females. In Life and Times, Jeffery is portrayed as a relatively socially conscious, insecure male. His beer-guzzling male counterpart appears to aspire for a more "macho" kind of image.

Bloom County gives us somewhat wacko male penguins, male children and adults. Even Garfield (also male) and his owner offer yet more types of characters. However, the same diversity cannot be found in the female characters. (Never mind that women constitute more than 50 percent of the U.S. population and are outnumbered in the comics about 4-to-1.)

The only comic strip the Collegian carries that I have not mentioned yet is Peanuts. The characters in this strip appear to be the least sexist of all. Lucy is portrayed in non-stereotypical roles with sometimes non-sexist dialogue. Males still outnumber females by a small margin (remember, Snoopy and Woodstock are males). But, in comparison to the other strips run in the Collegian, Peanuts offers more than large-breasted caricatures of women.

Being an ardent reader of the Sunday comics, I know that non-sexist strips do exist. I also know that strips with a better balance are available. If the people on this campus are really serious about their work for women's rights, should this not also extend into one of the bastions of American and college life: the comics?

SISCA activities

Editor,

I would like to take this opportunity to invite the University community at large to take in some of the events coming up in the next few days and next few weeks being sponsored by Students in Solidarity with Central America (SISCA).

At 12:30 p.m., on the island between the Union and Seaton Hall, a performance of what we like to term "guerrilla theatre" will take place. This is usually a mildly irreverent, politically based theatrical display that parodies a specific political figure whose views on the left we tend to disagree with — and who happens to be visiting K-State on or near the day the "guerrilla theatre" production is staged. This time around, a happy coincidence lines up the production with the visit of the right-wing conservative columnist, George F. Will.

At 7 p.m. in Union 207, SISCA is sponsoring a panel discussion led by a number of faculty members who are quite informed and involved politically, especially on Central American issues. The topic will focus around the role of political activism at the university level. It is free and open to the public.

We live in a great country (to coin a phrase) and certainly do enjoy a great amount of freedom to learn what we want and to express ourselves how we wish. SISCA hopes to provide the K-State and Manhattan communities with opportunities for the union of both of these ideas in their upcoming events. The invitations have been made.

Spices add Zest to Life

Gingerbread men and spiced tea and cakes would not be around if it were not for Christopher Columbus and Marco Polo's discovery of aromatic and flavorful seeds, leaves and bark that are the origins of different spices.

Polo and Columbus recognized the importance of these herbs and seeds in their exploration of new worlds. They brought the spices back to their homelands, and the spices became highly prized possesions.

The magical history of spices goes back to the days before the first records were kept — even then spices were treasured.

In early religious rites, spices were used as an instrument in worship.

Until modern methods of preserving and curing food were devised, spices such as allspice together with salt played a vital role in the long-term storage of meat and fish.

Spices were a highly priced commodity, at times more precious than gold, and their place of origin was the best kept secret of all-time.

The first sponsored voyages were to find these Eastern riches; the first international trade agreements were to receive them.

Most spices are found in the hot, damp tropical regions of the Orient and the Spice Islands of the East Indies. Some spices, mostly allspice and chile peppers, were found when the New World was discovered in the fifteenth century. More have been cultivated since their discovery.

Interest and variety can be added to bland dishes using spices. The cheapest meats can be turned into delicacies and add foreign flavor to every meal.

Most of the seeds, bark and roots used as spices are dried. They have a long shelf life and will keep almost indefinitely.

It is best to grow or buy spices in small quantities where the flavor is the best. Whole spices retain their flavor much better than ground, so the ideal is to buy whole spices.

Both light and heat affect the flavor, so the least efficient means of storage is the decorative rows of glass jars. Spices should be stored in dark-colored jars and placed away from heat and light.

When buying ground spices, it pays to select a reputable brand. The higher price will be an indication that the product has been carefully graded and will be more pure and pungent.

Allspice is native to Latin America and the West Indies where it was discovered by Spanish explorers. The name allspice recognizes the fact that the berries smell like a blend of cinnamon, cloves and nutmeg.

Allspice berries have a long history as a food preservative for meat. It is often used in pickling spice and is packed in barrels of fish to retain freshness.

Caraway is a plant which grows to about 2 feet high and has soft, fernlike leaves and white clumps of flowers. The fruits contain two seeds that make up the spice.

Caraway grows in Europe, North America, Russia and India. The seeds are allowed to ripen in the summer and are then dried and stored in airtight jars.

Caraway seeds are used to flavor cakes, breads and cookies. It was used by the Romans in caraway tea to aid digestion.

Cinnamon originated in Sri Lanka and is now being grown in South India. The tree, a member of the laurel family, can grow to a height of 30-40 feet. It has long, aromatic leaves but is cultivated for the dried inner bark.

The bark is peeled off in long strips. Bundles of bark are left for 24 hours to ferment then the crumbled outer layer is scraped off.

Cinnamon is used to spice pickling vinegar and in mulled wine drinks. Ground cinnamon is used in cakes, cookies and doughnuts.

Cloves are grown in Tanzania and the West Indies. This spice caused many voyages, expeditions and battles. The spice crop is the dried unopened flower bud.

Whole cloves are natural partners to apple dishes of all kinds. They are used to decorate and flavor baked ham. Ground cloves are used in fruitcakes, pickling and mincemeats. In Indonesia, cloves are mixed with tobacco in a thriving cigarette industry.

Gingerbread men and spiced tea and cakes would not be around if it were not for Christopher Columbus and Marco Polo's discoveries of aromatic and flavorful seeds, leaves and bark that are the origins of different spices.

The spice is harvested from the thick, knobby rhizomes which grow on the roots of the plant. They are marketed fresh, dried and ground. The dried root needs to be crushed or bruised to extract the flavor for use in pickles and curries. It is used most often in cakes, especially gingerbread.

Nutmeg is the kernal or nut of a fruit found in the West Indies. Nutmegs are sold whole and ground; the best way to use a whole nutmeg is to grate the amount needed. It is added to mulled wine, eggnog, hot and cold milk drinks, spiced breads, pies and doughnuts.

Pepper is one of the world's most important spices. One of the earliest trading commodities used by Oriental and European countries, both black and white pepper are produced from a climbing vine that is a native of India and the West Indies.

Black pepper is the entire peppercorn. White pepper is made from the berries left on the vine to mature and then soaked to soften the outer hull to a grayish-white.

Vanilla is one of the flavorings discovered by early explorers of the New world. It was brought to Europe by the Spaniards, who found the Aztecs using it as a flavoring for chocolate.

Grown on a climbing vine, the pods produced are dried or made into a liquid extract. Vanilla is used commercially in the manufacturing of chocolate, ice cream and puddings.

Provost search may go into summer

By The Collegian Staff

A new search for a University provost may begin in late summer if the single remaining candidate does not accept or is not offered the position, said John Keller, professor in regional and community planning and member of the search committee.

Keller gave his report during the monthly Faculty Senate meeting Tuesday afternoon in the Union Big Eight Room.

Milton Glick, dean of arts and sciences at the University of Missouri at Columbia, is the sole candidate. Glick will return to K-State Sunday and Monday with his family to see if a match between Glick and the University is possible, Keller said.

There will be no further involvement from the committee, and no further information will be released until after the visit, he said.

The three candidates who withdrew their applications are Dennis G. Brown, dean of the College of Letters and Science and professor of chemistry at Montana State University; Jim Ozbun, dean of the College of Agriculture and Home Economics at Washington State University; and Myron Henry, dean of the College of Arts and Sciences at Central Michigan University.

Provost Owen Koeppe will step down June 30 after seven years of service.

Another topic of discussion during the meeting was the nomination of honorary doctoral candidates for the 1987 May commencement. The two candidates, former Kansas Gov. John Carlin and former Kansas Supreme Court Chief Justice Alfred G. Schroeder, were approved after discussion by the senate.

"Both candidates qualify well and brought honor to the University and to the state," said Frank Orazem, professor of agricultural economics.

Board selects executive staff for fall Collegian

By LORI LINDSTROM
Collegian Reporter

Selection of the fall executive staff for the Collegian was announced by the Board of Student Publications at its meeting Tuesday afternoon.

Deron Johnson, junior in journalism and mass communications, was selected for the position of fall editor of the Collegian. Chosen for the fall advertising manager's position was Judy Haefele, junior in journalism and mass communications.

"I hope to continue the trend of the paper — the aggressive and in-depth reporting," Johnson said.

Johnson said one change he hopes to make is to get students in the Reporting 2 class more involved in the daily operations of the Collegian. He said the Collegian will rely heavily on these students because the number of students required to enroll in the class will be reduced next fall. Students majoring in advertising are no longer being required to take the class.

"I want to take steps early to involve the (Reporting 2) students," Johnson said. "We do depend on them."

Jonie Trued, senior in agricultural journalism and spring Collegian editor, said the Collegian is making large steps toward the emphasis of professionalism on the staff.

"I'm certain Deron will do everything possible to promote the professionalism of the staff," she said. "Deron isn't afraid of the long hours or the work, and he has turned out some first-rate pieces of journalism."

Trued said she believes Johnson has many good ideas to improve the way the Collegian is run, and his flare for creativity will influence the staff members in a positive way.

Johnson said he will begin to accept applications for fall staff members immediately. Positions open include managing editor, news editor, desk editors, copy editors, staff writers, photo editor, photographers, columnists and graphic artists.

Haefele said she was excited about being selected for the fall advertising manager's position. She said a goal for fall advertising staff is to improve the quality of the ads and to increase advertising sales by 9 percent from last fall. The total for last fall was $193,486, Haefele said.

"I want them (advertising staff members) to improve the creativity of our ads," Haefele said. "We will be using several incentive programs to increase creativity."

Sheila Hutinett, senior in journalism and mass communications and spring advertising manager for the Collegian, said she thinks Haefele will do a "wonderful job." Haefele's experience as a summer advertising intern at the Topeka Capital-Journal will help her at the Collegian, Hutinett said.

"I think Judy will be a real asset to the advertising department," she said. "She's pretty creative and has a lot of good ideas."

Available on the fall advertising staff are the positions of assistant advertising manager, account representatives and graphic artists, Haefele said.

She said she is looking for "aggressive, enthusiastic and dedicated go-getters" who are willing to work long hours.

Panel debates business crime

By KRISTI BARANCIK
Collegian Reporter

White-collar crime may not be as serious as Americans are being led to believe.

"Is greed getting the better of America?" was the question presented in a panel discussion during a business honors seminar Tuesday afternoon in Calvin Hall moderated by Richard P. Coleman, professor of marketing.

"I believe you will always see and read about sensational cases," but these cases give you a distorted view of business practices, said Richard Stultz, vice president for human resources and plant manager for McCall's Pattern Co., Manhattan.

"Enormous amounts of money certainly change people's perceptions on what is right and wrong," Stultz said. "I hope to keep this wave of white-collar crime in perspective."

Much of the publicity that white-collar crime is receiving may be attributed to the lack of competition by other issues in the news.

"I think the fact that business news is news is good news," said Steve Harrison, broker for Edward D. Jones and Co., Manhattan. There have been increased efforts by the Securities and Exchange Commission to help regulate such business crimes, he said.

'I'd like to see the government completely out of business. Each business has to set its own value standards and its own ethics.'

—Richard Stultz

"The fact that you're hearing about them says that the system is working," Harrison said.

"I think the question of legislating ethics is the responsibility not only of the government, but of every sector in society, as well as individuals," said Dave Stewart, campus minister for the American Baptist Campus Ministry.

Government regulation of business may not be the ultimate solution to white-collar crime. Business leaders are responsible for establishing a code of conduct within the organization, Stultz said.

"I'd like to see the government completely out of business," he said. "Each business has to set its own value standards and its own ethics."

"People who are in the leadership roles in our society need to tighten things up," said Edward Seaton, editor and publisher of the Manhattan Mercury. There is an absence of integrity in society today, not just in business, he said.

"The corporate culture of an organization creates the environment to allow or discourage fraudulent actions," Stultz said. Actions that start out to be innocent and subtle may snowball until they are out of control.

"Fraud is limited to the ingenuity of man," Stultz said. However, white-collar crime is not a new trend in American society, and in many cases it is simply more publicized than the successes and legitimate dealings in the business world.

"I don't think that there are a lot more shady deals occurring today," Harrison said, "(but) the dollars are bigger."

"I'm not sure that (business ethics) are any worse or any better in the country than they have been," said Charles Hostetler, First Savings Bank chairman and instructor of finance.

"The inside information situation is giving rise to a lot of the problems," Hostetler said. "Inside information is a very different situation from the standpoint that you have so many people working on these deals."

There may be a lack of antitrust legislation today which would help stop the circulation of such insider information, he said.

Speaker stresses economic cooperation

By LAUREN BRUNO
Collegian Reporter

Economic cooperation at the community level could spur economic innovation, increase research and development, and assist small businesses and family farms in the area, said Bill Norris, chairman emeritus of Control Data Corp.

Norris spoke to University President Jon Wefald, administrators and business community leaders Tuesday afternoon in the Union in an attempt to stimulate interest in economic development and job creation programs.

To successfully achieve these goals, communities must establish a job creation network, he said. The network functions at different levels in technological cooperation with industry, universities and state and federal governments.

"A partnership among industry, university and government is critically important to more efficiently create and transfer knowledge and to better train more people," Norris said.

Norris said he has developed an approach to economic development and job creation based on public and private technological cooperation using innovation.

"Innovation is the process of creating and utilizing technology to make improvements in existing products or creating new ones and getting them into the marketplace."

This approach to economic development and job creation is based on three premises, he said.

"There must be a vast increase in technological cooperation to more efficiently use the nation's resources."

By efficiently using resources, he said, innovation can be expanded to reverse the decline of U.S. competitiveness in the world market.

"(Secondly,) emphasis must be placed on assisting the small business sector because it is the source of new jobs," he said. "Lastly, new institutions must be established to facilitate technological cooperation."

Midwest Technology Development Institute has been established by nine Midwest states and recognized as a significant institution for advancing technological cooperation, Norris said.

MTDI has a threefold objective: expand cooperation among Midwest universities and industry to increase research efficiency; extend technological cooperation to include universities in foreign countries; and provide a mechanism to increase the availability of creating joint ventures between the Midwest and foreign countries.

Plans include heavy concentration on rural development. The rural enterprise partnership aids farm families in many ways, Norris said.

"Most problems are in rural America; therefore, we need to concentrate on agriculture and manufacturing for the revitilization necessary," Norris said.

Advanced technology would be taught to farmers, offering development and implementation of agricultural technology and expert systems developed to help farmers manage more profitably, he said.

"I'm impressed with the interest of the faculty here of doing the most they can do to help economic development and small business."

Group tours schools, sings at Royals game

By The Collegian Staff

After a Manhattan Transit bus stopped in front of All Faiths Chapel this morning, 64 men wearing blue blazers and gray pants loaded the bus: Its destination — Kansas City, Kan.

The K-State Men's Glee Club will be touring Kansas City high schools today and Thursday as part of its spring tour. Some of the schools they will perform at are Schlagle High School, Turner High School, Blue Valley North High School and Leawood Middle School.

This evening the Glee Club is scheduled to sing "The Star Spangled Banner" at the Kansas City Royals game in Royals Stadium.

"The Glee Club is made up of non-music majors, and we have become a very popular group over the past few years," said Mike Serpan, senior in marketing and men's glee club president.

Serpan attributes the group's success to its ability to perform a wide variety of music. He said the group's repertoire currently includes spiritual hymns, old drinking songs and the fight songs of Big Eight schools.

Sweepstakes winners may actually be losers

By JENNIFER LINDSEY
Staff Writer

"Enter our $100,000 prize giveaway and win an island vacation for two."

If this sounds familiar, it is probably because sweepstakes offers and so-called prize giveaways have been slowly but surely infiltrating American mailboxes.

People enter these contests hoping to win all the stakes in the game. Unfortunately, the rules of the game are often unclear and the stakes may be too high.

Magazine publishing companies popularized the use of sweepstakes in the early '60s to promote subscription sales. Sweepstakes are now used by many companies including fast-food restaurants, time-share condominiums and retail stores.

Sweepstakes promotions offered through the mail are usually disguised as offical business letters or actual checks made out to the receiver.

In order to win the "wonderful" prize offered, the recipient of the letter usually has to send in some sort of entry form and a letter stating they will agree to publicity if they should win, according to a pamphlet by S. Wycoff, of the Better Business Bureau in Arlington, Va.

The winners are determined by a random drawing of the entry forms.

If the outside envelope says, "You may be a pre-selected winner," don't start planning how to spend the money.

When this phrase is used, every name chosen from a list is assigned a number. These are the "pre-selected" winners, Wycoff said.

Companies get their lists from several different sources, from telephone directories to "list" companies. These are companies that buy customers' names from other companies and then sell them or rent them out, Wycoff said.

Some sweepstakes promoters can specifically request a certain type of list — the names of people who have demonstrated a tendency to purchase mail-order items, for example.

The people on these lists who receive these sweepstakes offers are instructed to return their "secret" number for a possible win. If the winning number, chosen by a national sweepstakes-drawing company, is not returned, the prize does not have to be awarded to anyone, Wycoff said.

Although there are many legitimate sweepstakes offers, each consumer must realize many others might be receiving the "You may be a winner" envelope.

"It goes to millions of people, and your chances (for winning) are pretty slim," said Marilyn White, operations manager at the BBB in Topeka.

However, should someone be lucky enough to win a prize in one of the sweepstakes, there are other aspects to consider.

According to the Internal Revenue Service, a sweepstakes winner is required to pay taxes on the fair market value of the prize won.

For example, a person may win a car with a fair market value of $10,000. This amount would have to be reported to the IRS as income for that "lucky" year.

"The addition of the $10,000 to a person's yearly income would most likely bump a winner to a higher tax bracket, subsequently causing an individual to owe more taxes," according to Wycoff's pamphlet.

Because many sweepstakes offers are, in fact, legitimate, the consumer may wonder how the companies can give away thousands of dollars and still come out ahead.

"Quite simply, the companies, such as magazines, sell enough subscriptions through their promotions to make themselves a profit," White said.

With most offers, the consumer is given the choice of receiving a company's mail-order catalog or ordering some merchandise. However, under a federally mandated law, those who are just entering the contest and those who are also ordering a product or catalog must have equal chances of winning the prize.

Sweepstakes are regulated by several federal organizations to ensure legitimacy. The U.S. Postal Service, for example, examines all promotions that go through the mail.

The Federal Trade Commission also helps keep promotions and sweepstakes offers legitimate by regulating all unfair or deceptive promotions. One organization was charged by the FTC because its sweepstakes promotion was deceptive and prizes that were advertised in the promotion were never awarded to the supposed winners, Wycoff said.

The FTC also requires that the exact number of prizes in each category and the odds of winning be made available, the geographic area covered by the game be made clear and the expiration date of the game be indicated somewhere on the original offer.

Although sweepstakes promotions prompt a lot of inquiries at the BBB in Topeka, there have not been many complaints, White said.

Track coach wins big during signing period

By The Collegian Staff

One of the big winners during the signing period for spring sports has been K-State track and cross country coach John Capriotti.

Since the signing period began March 8, Capriotti has landed six quality athletes. Four were signed on opening day and two more signees were announced Tuesday.

Among the track notables signed were Clifton Ethridge, a long jumper from Hendersonville, N.C.; Missouri cross country champion Phil Byrne and sprinter Tyrone Watkins from Topeka.

Ethridge leaped 25-foot-5 in the long jump last year as a junior — the third-best leap among prep athletes nationwide. He was heavily recruited by such schools as Texas A&M, North Carolina State and Tennessee.

"Clifton may be one of the best, if not the best, athletes which K-State has ever signed," Capriotti said. "The only long jumper in the (Big Eight) conference to jump farther than him last season was our own Kenny Harrison.

Byrne was selected as an alternate for the World Cross Country Championships held at Warsaw, Poland, in March. Watkins brings with him three state-best times in the 100-meter, 200-meter and 400-meter dashes.

"We're excited to have two runners of this caliber join us at K-State," Capriotti said.

Ellarie Pesmark is Capriotti's lone signee for women's track. She was the 400-meter dash runner-up at the state meet last year as a junior.

"She can do a lot of things and will continue to only get better," Capriotti said.

In women's basketball, Coach Matilda Mossman landed Jennifer Grebing from Frohna, Mo. The 6-2 center averaged 19 points and 10 rebounds per game last season at Perryville High School.

"She has good hands inside as both a rebounder and a shooter" Mossman said. "We can't wait to give her more experience."

Earlier signings previously announced included one for men's basketball, four in women's basketball and two in women's tennis.

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Jennifer Grebing, 6-2, center, Frohna, Mo. (Perryville). Averaged 19 points and 10 rebounds a game this past season. Grebing set records for most rebounds in a state playoff game (16) and was the third leading all-time scorer in the state of Missouri with more than 1,600 points.

Nadira Hazim, 5-8, guard, Topeka (West). An all-state, all-league and all-city performer who averaged 24 points and seven rebounds as a senior at Topeka West High School. Hazim was one of two individuals from Kansas named to the National Youth Foundation's All-America team.

MEN'S TRACK

Tyrone Watkins, 6-2, sprinter, Wichita (West). Defending state 400-meter champion who had the fastest times in the state last year in the 100-meter (10.4), 200-meter (21.3) and 400-meter (48.0) dashes. Watkins was a high school All-American in the 400-meter dash.

Pat Allen, 5-10, javelin, Kingman (Hutchinson Community College). A junior college All-American in the javelin with a personal best of 205-0. He was a three-sport standout letterman in football, basketball and track at Kingman High School

Clifton Ethridge, 5-8, long jump, Hendersonville, N.C. Ethridge was named All-American by Track & Field News, USA Today and National High School Coaches' Association. Last year as a junior, he leaped 25-5 in the long jump — third best in the nation among prep athletes.

Phil Byrne, 5-10, distance, Independence, Mo. (O'Hara). Was the Missouri state cross country champion and was selected as an alternate for the World Cross Country Championships held in Warsaw, Poland in March. "He will have an immediate impact on our team, which is hard for a freshman to do," Capriotti said.

Todd Eggers, 6-0, middle distance, Kansas City, Mo. (Park Hill). Undefeated in cross country before a stress fracture held him out of this season's cross country meet. Eggers has great range, Capriotti said, and can be run in any event ranging from the half mile to the 10,000 meters.

WOMEN'S TRACK

Ellarie Pesmark, long sprinter, Topeka (Seaman). Was runner-up in the 400-meter dash at the state meet last year with a 56.5. Pesmark also ran the anchor leg on Seaman's state champion mile relay team. "Ellarie is a good example of untapped talent," Capriotti said.

In addition to the above athletes, K-State earlier released the names of athletes listed below who also have signed letters of intent.

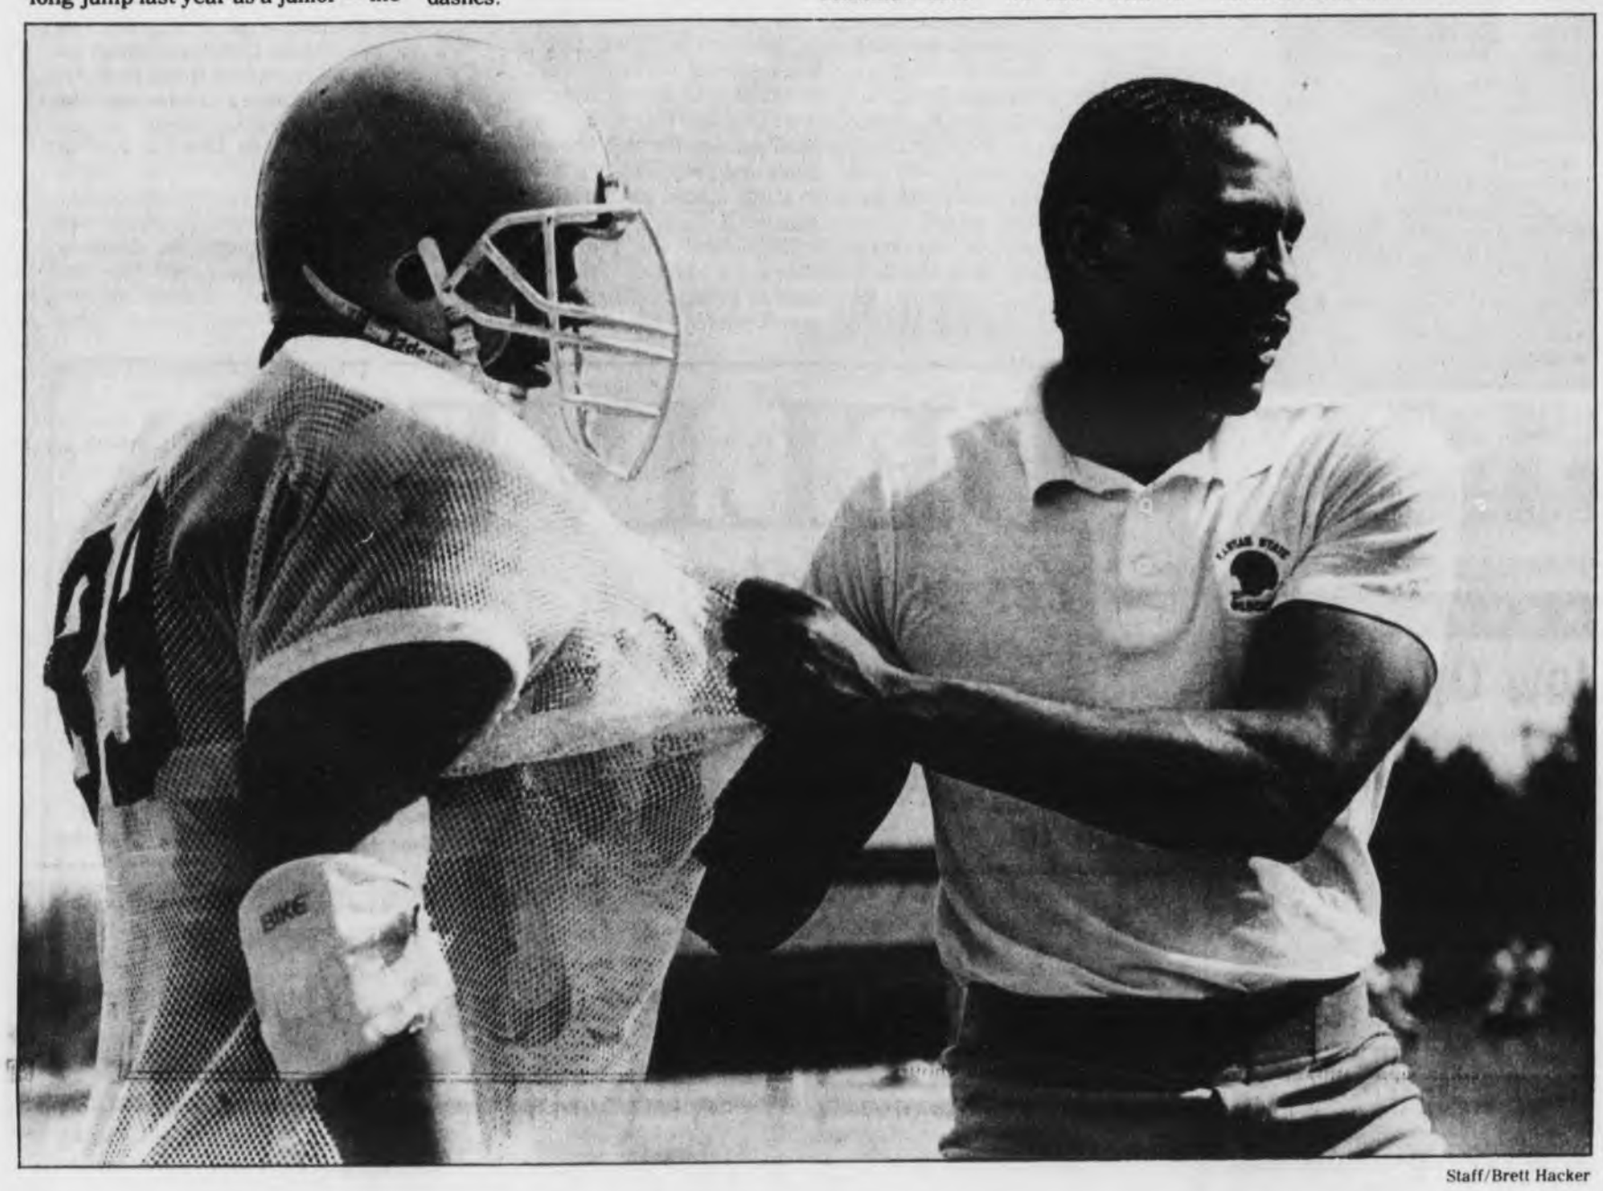
MEN'S BASKETBALL

John Rettiger, 6-9, 210-pound, center, Strong City (Chase County).

WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Tonya King, 6-0, forward, Liberal.

Stacey Boyle, 6-2, center, Dodge City, (Dodge City CC).



Diana Miller, 5-11, forward, Hutchinson (Buhler).

Kristie Bahner, 5-11, forward, Topeka, (Topeka High).

WOMEN'S TENNIS

Thresa Burcham, Little Rock, Ark. (McClellan).

Mistie Bitner, Bonner Springs.

Defensive end coach L.C. Cole, a second-assistant, wants his players to first learn how to win and believes the Wildcats can go to a bowl game next season.

"My goal is to give the players a vacation in December," he said. Cole received All-Big Eight honors in 1979 while playing for Nebraska.

Cole eyes bowl bid for K-State in 1987

By STEVE LAWRENCE
Collegian Reporter

K-State's football team has been to only one bowl game, in which the Wildcats lost 14-3 to Wisconsin at the 1982 Independence Bowl in Shreveport, La.

But if defensive end coach L.C. Cole has his way, K-State will have to alter a section in its media guide so it will read "bowl appearances" after next season.

When K-State's football team takes to the field this fall, defensive end coach L.C. Cole first wants his players to have learned the art of winning.

But besides teaching his players how to win, the second-year assistant said the goal he has set for the Wildcats next season is to go to a bowl game.

Assistant Coaches of K-State

He said a bowl-game bid would be a great reward for the team's hard work throughout the year.

"My goal is to give the players a vacation in December," Cole said.

Cole, 31, received All-Big Eight honors in 1979 while playing for Nebraska, and he knows from playing as a Cornhusker what it takes to win. He then played for the New York Jets in 1980 before starting his coaching career that has taken him to the University of Nebraska, New Mexico State University, Ball State University and then to his position at K-State.

Although his playing experiences usually ended with a victory, his coaching experience has given him a taste of what it's like to lose. Cole said he learned how to accept losing while he was defensive end coach at New Mexico State because the team suffered several losses.

Along with accepting a loss, he learned how to turn a program around.

He said one of the first things to consider when turning a program around is the players the team recruits. Cole said there are many differences between the professional teams and the college ranks when it comes to recruiting.

Cole said the pros have a definite advantage acquirng players.

"The pros have a draft to get superior athletes. This enables the pros to run any kind of defense they want," Cole said. "In college you have to adapt your defense to the abilities of the players you have."

As an assistant at Nebraska, Cole worked with about 12 defensive ends. While at Ball State University, he said, the players were average and he really had to work hard to get them to play to their full potential.

At K-State, however, and considering the depth of talent in the Big Eight Conference, Cole said, it takes a team of superior athletes to be competitive.

And the 'Cats aren't that far from being competitive, Cole said.

"We can be competitive with Nebraska and Oklahoma in two years," he said.

University ignoring 'Cat rowing teams; athletic fee needed

CHASE CLARK
Sports Writer

It doesn't seem fair to put one varsity sport ahead of another, such as the case with K-State's rowing crew.

While K-State supports 12 varsity teams, it ignores one of its most successful programs to date — K-State's rowing teams.

K-State's varsity eight-man crew won the Big Eight Conference championship last year and look to be in good shape to win it again. The team has a 4-0 record dating back to the last race of last spring.

This record includes victories against the University of Kansas and the University of Nebraska — both of which are school-supported.

Now just think what K-State's crew could do if it received financial support. Basically, there are two reasons why K-State doesn't fund the crew.

First, the Wildcat crew refuses to become part of K-State's sports club council.

The sports club council consists of University club sports such as the rugby team and the parachute club. Each year Student Senate appropriates money to the council, if requested, to fund club teams.

Student Senate decided it would be easier and more consistent to allocate funds in this way, said Sally Rouston, coordinator of student activities at K-State, rather than hearing individual requests from teams.

K-State's crew received $600 from Student Senate in 1984-85, the first year the council existed. Since then, though, the Wildcats have not received any funds from Student Senate or the sports club council.

Why? Because the crew refuses to be considered a sports club and therefore can't receive funds from Student Senate.

"(Student Senate) wanted to lump the crew in with the sports clubs," said K-State crew coach Don Rose. "We consider ourselves to be a varsity sport, not a club sport. We aren't a sports club and don't want to be considered one."

When the crew was first started 24 years ago, it was well supported by the University, Rose said.

"The first five to six years the crew was well supported by the Student Senate through the athletic fee," he added. "But that changed later on.

"K-State is the only varsity crew in Kansas that's not supported by their school," he added. "As an orphan varsity sport we certainly need the support."

On the other side of the coin is the view of K-State's Student Governing Association.

"If they wanted to become part of the group and request funds they could have," Rouston said. "I've talked to members of the crew before, but the general feeling (among the crew) is 'we need more than what you can give us and if you can't give us more, then forget it.'"

As for the second reason, Athletic Director Larry Travis said it is not feasible for K-State to support additional sports at this time.

"I've talked to several people from the crew before about them wanting to become part of the varsity program," Travis said. "But we're not going to add any other sports until we can fund them properly.

"We had to drop (men's tennis and women's softball) last year and we aren't going to add more sports until we get those two back, and at this time we don't plan to add any," he added.

Sounds like common sense to me. It's like buying a Ferrari when you can only afford a Volkswagen. You may enjoy the Ferrari, but sooner or later you are going to have to give it up.

There is a solution to this problem — one that has been in the news for more than a year now. K-State needs a student athletic fee to help fund fledgling varsity athletics and club sports programs.

The fee would not only benefit people involved with athletics, but it would benefit the University by increasing the quality of its programs and giving K-State more media exposure as the teams do better competitively.

Positive exposure would help draw more students to K-State. Very few people would want to attend K-State if the quality of its academic programs were poor. Why should it be any different for athletics?

By better funding athletic programs, victories could become commonplace at K-State.

Rain halts WSU-'Cat baseball game

Rain forced the postponement of Tuesday's K-State-Wichita State baseball game. The game has been rescheduled for May 6. Weather permitting, the Wildcats will play Tarkio College in a double-header at 1 p.m. today at Frank Myers Field.

Soccer team wins 2 at Big 8 meet

The K-State men's soccer team advanced to the semifinals of the Big Eight Conference tournament played Saturday at Boulder, Colo. The Wildcats posted 1-0 victories against Oklahoma and Oklahoma State before losing 2-0 to Iowa State.

Snow forced the rescheduling of the semifinal and final matches. Exact date and location are still pending.

Mantle ready to depart hospital

Former baseball star Mickey Mantle was cheerful and ready to go home after tests showed that chest pains he suffered probably stemmed from stress syndrome, a doctor said Tuesday.

"Mr. Mantle has had no previous history of heart problems. He does have evidence of bronchitis and has had physical symptoms suggesting stress syndrome," said Dr. Michael Rothkopf, medical director of Irving (Texas) Heart Institute.

WSU places 1st in K-State Golf Classic

By The Collegian Staff

The women's golf team from Wichita State maintained its 15-stroke lead and won the rain-shortened, 27-hole K-State Women's Golf Classic played Monday and Tuesday at Rolling Meadows Golf Course in Junction City.

The second day of tournament play was limited to nine holes of action due to rainy weather.

"All members of the teams should be commended for playing in this junk," K-State Coach Rob Sedorcek said.

K-State finished second in the four-team tournament at the par-72, 5,515-yard Rolling Meadows course. Wichita State — with three of its golfers placing in the top five — took the title with a 506, 15 strokes ahead of the Wildcats.

Northeast Missouri State followed K-State with a score of 539. North Dakota University rounded out the field with a score of 556.

Wichita State's Tracey Brawey fired a 40 for the low score of the day. Teammate Ann Vandermillen took individualist honors with 122 (80-42). Brawey tied for second place with 'Cat golfer Paige Harrison, both with scores of 127. Brawey's two-day scores were 87-40, and Harrison carded 84-45.

For K-State, senior Paige Harrison was the only team member to place in the top five of the tournament, taking third with a 127 (84-43). Other Wildcat scores were Erin Andrew 130 (83-47), Shelley Sherman 131 (89-42), Jill Zientara 133 (91-42) and Maj-Beth Rulifson 145 (99-46).

"WSU has played for almost 10 days straight. Consequently, they're more on top of their game. Hopefully we'll be able to work hard so that we'll be ready for the Big Eight Tournament," Sodercek said.

Final Team Results

1. Wichita State — 506.
2. K-State — 521.
3. Northeast Missouri State — 539.
4. North Dakota — 556

4. D'Anne Gross, Northeast Missouri — 128 (83-45).

Cubs' pitcher flirts with no-hitter for 8 innings

By The Associated Press

PHILADELPHIA — The only thing better than pitching a no-hitter would be doing it before your family and friends. And that's almost what happened to Jamie Moyer.

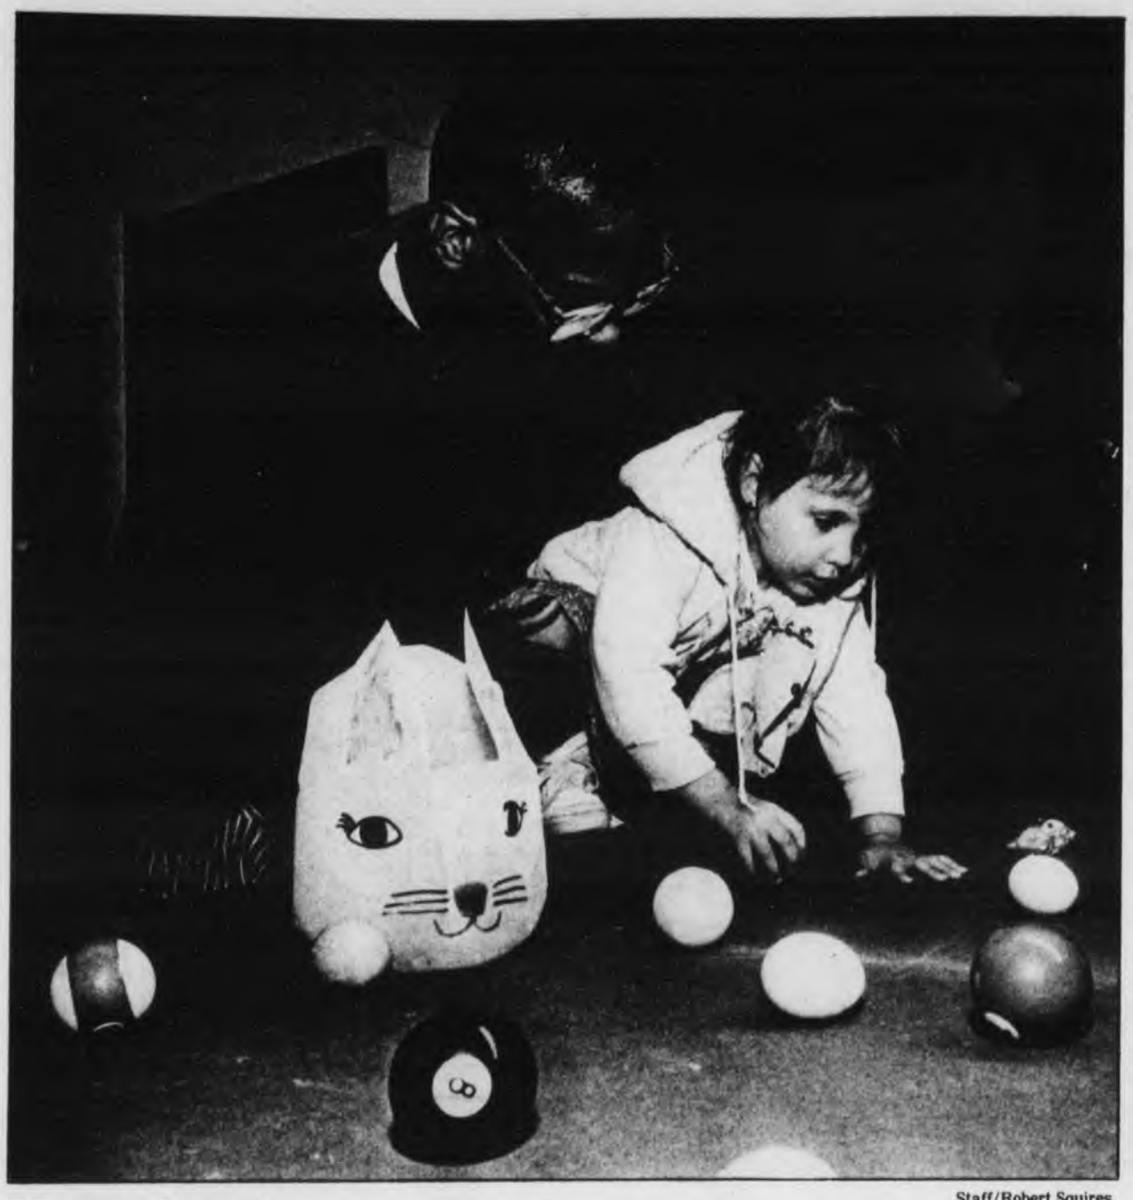
The Chicago Cub's left-hander, who grew up in nearby Souderton, held the Philadelphia Phillies hitless through eight innings Monday night before yielding a clean single to Juan Samuel leading off the bottom of the ninth.

It would have been the first no-hitter ever pitched at Veteran's Stadium, which opened in 1971.

When Samuel came to the plate, virtually everyone in the stadium, including Moyer's parents and a multitude of friends, was cheering for the 24-year-old. In fact, Samuel's single was followed by emphatic but good-natured booing.

Moyer's only other appearance in Philadelphia was last June, a week after he had been recalled by Chicago. He was rocked for six runs in 2⅔ innings as the Phillies went on to a 19-1 victory.

"I wanted to prove to my teammates and to all of my people that were here that I could pitch in Philadelphia," Moyer said. "After my last start here, there might have been some doubts."



Moyer, who was 7-4 last season, was pitching in his 18th major league game. He struck out 12 and walked six. After Samuel's hit, a walk and another hit followed and Lee Smith came in to save the 5-2 victory.

Moyer, who pitched three consecutive no-hitters in high school, was aware of the no-hitter but said he really felt no pressure.

"I was thinking about it in the seventh and eighth innings," he said.

"But I felt fine going out in the ninth. I was a little upset with myself because I got the pitch to Samuel up a little. It's a guessing game and Samuel guessed right."

He said he was getting a little tired since it was his first start of the year.

Suspenseful film 'Mona Lisa' features complex protagonist

By GARY JOHNSON
Collegian Reviewer

Bob Hoskins, star of the powerful and poignant "Mona Lisa," is one of the most consistently fascinating actors in movies today. He has been described as everything from a fireplug to a bulldog, but those descriptions fail to get at the core of humanity which he brings to every character he plays. He might look like a Napoleon ready to explode, but inside, his characters are too naive to really understand the world in which they live.

Film Review

In Neil Jordan's dark and magnificent "Mona Lisa," Hoskins plays a small time hood named George who is released from prison after a seven-year sentence. George had played the fall guy for Mortwell (Michael Caine), an underworld crime boss who specializes in pornography and prostitution, so now Mortwell gives George a job driving a beautiful, high-priced call girl, Simone (Cathy Tyson), from one trick to the next. She looks like a princess with the confident tilt of her head and her velvety chocolate-brown skin.

To Simone, George is hopelessly coarse, so she gives him a roll of money to buy a new wardrobe. He must look good if he is going to escort her to her clients' high class hotels. But instead of buying a suit like she intended, George shows up in a leather jacket and gawdy polyester shirt. "Doncha like it?" he says while her eyes roll toward the ceiling.

Hoskins is a master at playing these not-too-intelligent type characters. A lesser actor might have turned George's coarseness into cuteness, and thus made the character irritating, but Hoskins gives the character a volatile, yet vulnerable, nature.

This is shown in the movie's very first scene when George, fresh out of prison, shows up at his wife's home with a bundle of flowers. His daughter opens the door, but she doesn't know what to say to him. His wife then starts screaming and throws the flowers in his face. George stands on the sidewalk, confused and angry.

The movie's film noir-ish plot really gets going after George and Simone begin to respect each other. She then asks him to search for her friend, Cathy. This leads George on a lurid journey through London's strip joints and peep shows. But ultimately Cathy's trail leads right back to Mortwell.

Throughout the film, Nat King Cole's '50s classic, "Mona Lisa," is used as a refrain. This gives the song new depth for those who think it is only a schmaltzy relic of its time. George becomes like the romantic hero of the lyrics, especially once he begins to fall in love with Simone.

Cole sings "Are you real, Mona Lisa?/Or just a cold and lonely lovely work of art?" These same questions might be in George's mind when he thinks about Simone. He's not articulate enough to ever ask such questions, but his eyes reveal the confusion he feels whenever he thinks of her.

It's Hoskins' performance (which earned him an Oscar nomination) that really makes "Mona Lisa" a success, but he isn't the film's only asset. Cathy Tyson as Simone delivers a wonderful performance. Standing tall and straight, with her shoulders thrown back, she's like an Arabian princess.

The film's other main strength is the direction of Neil Jordan. In "The Company of Wolves" (1985), he showed himself to be a master of visuals. "Mona Lisa" is likewise exceptionally well-photographed, showing Jordan's taste for the unusual.

At times "Mona Lisa" is predictable, especially for those people familiar with the conventions of film noir; but the movie overcomes this predictability through the depth of the characterizations and the Hitchcockian suspense created by Jordan's forever-moving camera.

Shultz, in a 4½-hour meeting with Gorbachev, delivered a new invitation from Reagan to go to Washington for a superpower summit meeting this year.

But the Soviet leader told reporters that "generally, without reason, I do not go anywhere, particularly America."

Shultz met Gorbachev, along with their senior advisers, in Catherine's Hall in the Grand Kremlin Palace on the heels of a bitter public exchange between the superpowers on spy charges.

"This cannot be just a stroll," Gorbachev said as he again stressed a summit meeting should produce solid results.

A senior U.S. official, in a post-midnight briefing, refused to say whether the session produced any progress. He said, however, that "the summit was not a central issue."

Shultz met also with Premier Nikolai Ryzhkov and Foreign Minister Eduard A. Shevardnadze — a total of nearly 10 hours with senior Soviet officials. Shultz had four separate meetings with his staff.

In a downbeat report at the end of Shultz's busy day, Tass said: "The U.S. leadership is practically unprepared to act vigorously, to go its part of the way," to improve superpower relations.

And yet, the dispatch said, Gorbachev offered to unilaterally eliminate the Soviet tactical nuclear weapons.

"What are you afraid of?" Gorbachev was quoted as saying.

The effect of the proposal was not immediately clear. The two sides have been locked in debate over the SS-12s and SS-23s, with the Soviets arguing they are short-range rockets which should be dealt with separately.

The United States, which has no such weapons, classifies them as medium-range and backed by its allies wants them included the proposed agreement.

Carlin

lot of talent, but we import a lot of talent, too."

What needs to be done to improve the number of quality individuals remaining in Kansas is "people need to realize if the community is growing, they need to pay better salaries," he said.

Carlin said once the economy starts to improve, the state should immediately start financing education rather than figuring out how to give the excess back to the taxpayers.

"You don't always serve the taxpayers best by giving it back."

On the issue of contracting out jobs to save governmental dollars, he said the most important thing is to ensure that the accountability remains.

"There is a great deal of potential in contracting out, but it is not the answer to everything," he said.

Looking back on the years he served as governor, Carlin said he left the office with very few regrets.

"I really believe if I contributed anything at all, it was getting the state to believe that change is OK," he said. "I didn't accomplish everything, but the bulk of the agenda got through."

National ad campaign discourages tampering

By The Associated Press

CHICAGO — The scene is a phone booth, and a caller is threatening to poison a food or drug product.

"Make a product tampering threat from this box," warns the voice of actor Dennis Franz, Lt. Norman Buntz on "Hill Street Blues," as the scene shifts to a prison cell, "and you'll end up in this box, for five years."

The 30-second TV commercial is part of a planned nationwide advertising campaign to curb the growing number of product-tampering threats.

The campaign being launched this week in Chicago, where seven people died in 1982 after taking cyanide-laced Tylenol capsules, is a cooperative effort by the Food and Drug Administration, the FBI, the Advertising Council and several industry associations.

There were 1,692 tampering threats reported in the United States last year, up from 128 in 1985, according to FDA statistics.

Industry sources say most of the threats were phony.

"More than $1 billion in perfectly good products had to be destroyed because of threats that people phoned in," said Bill Weintraub, vice president of marketing for Kellogg Co. in Battle Creek, Mich., and one of the coordinators of the ad campaign.

Drug companies alone are spending $500 million to $1 billion a year just on protective packaging.

"There are other costs that we really don't know about, like the cost of inspecting these products and security costs at plants," Weintraub added.

Psychiatric studies indicate product-tampering threats tend to come from males age 20 to 30, usually with no criminal record, said George Schott, vice president of J. Walter Thompson U.S.A. in Chicago, the agency that volunteered to develop the anti-tampering campaign.

For that reason, the ads focus on the consequences of product tampering under federal law — up to five years in prison or a $10,000 fine for making a threat, and up to life in prison or a $250,000 fine for carrying out the threat.

"It's the people who think it's a joke or a lark — that's who we're trying to dissuade," Weintraub said. "The FBI is pretty effective in tracking down people who actually tampered with products. But the people doing it as a joke are more difficult to trace. We think the public at large doesn't understand the severity of the problem."

Travel class to visit 'Land Down Under'

By BRUCE DOLSBERRY
Collegian Reporter

Some teachers will be traveling Down Under this summer to see the sights and observe the work of their Australian counterparts.

"This travel class is designed for teachers, spouses and others who want to visit infant, primary, junior or secondary schools in Australia," said Ray Kurtz, professor of curriculum and instruction.

The Down Under Travel Class will travel to Australia, New Zealand and Hawaii June 11-July 2.

"I've planned five trips to Europe in the last 10 years," he said. "With the terrorism in Europe and the uneasiness it has caused some of our travelers in the past, Australia seemed to be the place to go."

Although originally 20-25 people were expected to go, 35 people registered.

People from six different states will be going on the excursion, but about 75 percent of the participants are from Kansas, Kurtz said.

All but 10 percent of the travelers are teachers who will have the opportunity to observe students in Australia and compare the quality of schools, the quality of instruction and other areas of education with that in the United States, he said.

"Our objectives are to observe the methods and techniques used by Australian teachers and to improve teaching content by visiting the outstanding historical and cultural sights," Kurtz said.

In addition to visiting schools in the outlying areas of Sydney, Australia, the group will look at schools in Sydney, Canberra and Melbourne, Australia. The deputy administrator will address the wayfarers about a seminar on education in Sydney, Kurtz said.

Some of the cultural and historical sights on the agenda include Australia's Parliament House, the Royal Australian Mint, Phillip Island, home of the largest colony of penguins, and Cairns reef, with giant clams, sea turtles, tropical fish and more than 350 varieties of coral.

In addition to Hawaii, other sightseeing stops include Auckland, Rotorua and Waltoma, New Zealand.
